Asper spearheads human rights museum

Izzy Asper

WINNIPEG — Media mogul Israel Asper believes in giving back to his community. In 1983, he founded the Asper Foundation, which, in recent years, has poured tens of millions of dollars into philanthropic projects in Winnipeg and Israel.

His latest vision is a $200-million Canadian Museum of Human Rights to be built within the next three years at The Forks in downtown Winnipeg.

Plans for the museum were unveiled in a press conference last month by the Asper family, along with Federal Heritage Minister Sheila Copps; Stephen Owen, secretary of state and the minister responsible for western economic diversification; and Rey Pagtakhan, senior federal minister for Manitoba.

"This will be the largest human rights museum in the world," said Moe Levy, the Asper Foundation's executive director.

Mother and child reunion

There was a special surprise for five IDF soldiers from overseas. These soldiers, known as chayalim bodedim, are on their own with no family connections in Israel. Without the soldiers' knowledge, the Defence Ministry arranged to have their mothers flown in to be with their children for the Passover holiday. Here we see one such happy surprise reunion. [Israpet photo]

SARS a factor as Israel mission cancelled

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — The Jewish federation here cancelled a scheduled May mission to Israel early last month, largely because of public concern about the SARS outbreak in Toronto.

This, however, was not the only reason. "There were a number of other factors," said Bob Freedman, the federation's executive vice-president. He cited the war in Iraq as well, noting the last day for deposits coincided with the start of the war on March 20.

"That combined with the reality that we were scheduled to go through Toronto and a lot of people don't want to travel to Toronto for business or pleasure because of the SARS problem," he said.

The final decision to abort the mission was made even before last week's World Health Organization advisory against travel to Toronto.

Freedman said 32 people had expressed interest in going on the trip, but, in the end, only eight signed up.

German invasion changed a child's life

Part 2 of 2

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Bianka Kraszewski gently pushes back the lid of a battered old leather suitcase, and surveys the treasures contained within.

Life in the Warsaw Ghetto

Smaller than most of today's carry-on luggage, the suitcase and its contents are one of the few mementoes she still has from a happy life in pre-war Poland – and a reminder of the devastating experiences of life under the Nazis.

Inside are an assortment of old clothes, a school uniform, a dressing gown and her "pretty," a delicate slip that was her pride and joy.

A yellowed booklet is particularly precious, as it contains the hand-written notes from her parents that helped her survive two years in hiding in wartime Warsaw.

Kraszewski, nee Rozenman, was just a child when German forces invaded Poland on Sept. 1, 1939. As she recalls life as a nine-year-old, things were pretty happy before the war. Residing in Lodz, her family was fairly well-to-do. Her father, Pawel, worked for a company that supplied machinery to the city's numerous textile mills. He would often travel to England, France and Germany on business.

The family enjoyed a comfortable apartment and no expense was spared to provide their children with a good education. Despite the cost involved, Bianka was enrolled in a private Jewish school so she would not have to undergo the anti-Semitic taunting experienced by her older brother, Ryszard.

Bianka Kraszewski

In the summer, the kids were sent to a rental cottage outside Lodz while at other times, she took skating and dance lessons. She even had a nanny, Kraszewski recalls.

The German invasion, of course, changed all that.

"I remember the sirens in Lodz," Kraszewski said, as well as a trip with her father to the nearby patisserie where the men discussed the military situation.

She remembers sometime later that the family moved en masse to Warsaw, where her grandmother had a flat paid for by her father. Inside the cramped quarters the family slept on folding cots and a cold draft permeated the apartment through bombed out windows that were sealed with newspaper.

The family acquired a potbelly stove to keep the apartment warm, and meals, she noticed, started getting worse.

The loss of their pre-war lives devastated the family. Thrown out of work, "my father was a broken man. My mother started selling stockings from place to place. But there was not food, only bread made of potato peels and sawdust." Sometimes the kids would get jam made of beets and saccharin or raw rhubarb with a little more saccharin.

In 1942, her father made contact with an old employee who ran the Shultz workshops that refurbished German army uniforms and sent them back out to the field.

With his experience, her father was made a manager. Her mother worked there too. Bianka was take along and with other kids was made to hide during inspections behind bales of lice-ridden, bloody army uniforms.

During that time her aged grandmother was dragged away from the factory and her father would have lost his life as well if others hadn't restrained him and cupped a hand over his mouth. "We were told they buried her alive," she said.

Many of her relatives were taken away to Poniatowa and to Trawniki where they were killed, but through luck and good contacts, her family managed to go into hiding.

In November 1942, Genia Olczak, later named a righteous Gentile, who had worked as a nanny for her aunt and uncle, smuggled Kraszewski and her mother out of the ghetto, finding hiding places in various safe houses in Aryan Warsaw.

Later, her father was put in the trunk of a car by the factory manager, Fritz Shultz, and taken to the Aryan side. The family, now separated, was taken from place to place and hidden by the Zagota Polish underground.

Meanwhile, her grandfather in Warsaw committed suicide rather than be deported, and her brother was taken to the Trawniki camp and killed. Many other aunts and uncles were also killed in the camp.

When the ghetto uprising took place on April 19, 1943, Kraszewski was in hiding and she knew little of it. Thirteen at the time, she found herself locked in a room to prevent her from running around and alerting curious neighbours about her presence.

"When I think about it, it seems like someone else. I don't know how I survived it."

Lastman to lead municipal leaders' mission to Israel

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

Toronto Mayor Mel Lastman will lead the first-ever delegation of Canadian municipal officials to Israel beginning May 10.

Lastman and his wife Marilyn will join a dozen other municipal politicians and officials from Canadian Jewish Congress on the five-day CJC-sponsored mission to meet with their Israeli counterparts and get a sense of the issues they face.

Also scheduled are meetings with Prime Minister Ariel Sharon, finance minister Benjamin Netanyahu and industry and commerce minister Ehud Olmert. The participants will also be briefed on how municipalities cope with the threat of terrorism.

There will be a strong contingent from York Region, north of Toronto. Scheduled to go are Thornhill Tory MPP Tina Molinari, who's also associate minister of municipal affairs; York Region chair Bill Fisch; Vaughan Mayor Michael Di Biase; and Vaughan Ward 5 councillor Susan Kadis.

The participants are slated to travel to the city of Ramla in Israel, which has special significance for the City of Vaughan. The two municipalities twinned a decade ago to encourage deeper cultural and economic ties between them.

Congress says it's important to sensitize these officials to Israel's concerns because often, the municipal level is a stepping stone to bigger things in politics.

Also scheduled to take part are Ken Boshcoff, the mayor of Thunder Bay and president of the Association of Municipalities of Ontario; Scott Northmore, mayor of Bracebridge; Frank Miele, York Region's commissioner of economy/technology/development & communications; Alex Munter, a city councillor from Kanata; James Gordon, the mayor of Sudbury; and Toronto city councillor Mike Feldman.

Toronto Mayor Mel Lastman

A statement from Lastman's office says that of "special interest" to Toronto is the changing demographic face of many Israeli municipalities and the rapidly developing infrastructures they have.

The politicians will be briefed on Israel's light rail project and will see the country's new Cross-Israel Highway, developed with Canadian know-how based on Highway 407 technology.

Meetings are slated with the mayor of Tel Aviv, Ron Huldai, and the mayor of Jerusalem, Uri Lupoliansky.

As well, participants will be briefed by Canada's ambassador to Israel, Michael Bell, and by Canada's envoy to the Palestinian Authority, Steven Hibbert.

Scheduled too is a tour of the Canada Center in Metulla, Israel's northernmost town, and tours of Christian sites, such as Capernaum and parts of the Galilee. There will also be visits to Yad Vashem and to Hadassah Hospital.

The junket's purpose is to introduce "one more group of important Canadian decision makers and policy makers to Israeli society and challenges faced by both government and people of Israel," says CJC Ontario region chair Ed Morgan, who will be accompanied by region executive director Bernie Farber; political action committee chair Rachel Turkienicz; CJC director of community development Michael Soberman; and CJC national treasurer Cary Green.

"We hope also to introduce them to environmental and urban planning issues," adds Morgan, "and to hopefully showcase innovative solutions Israel has come up with."

Perception is reality

From the editor's desk

It is generally true that distance – separation from an object being measured – fosters perspective, and that perspective usually fosters more accurate perception.

This axiom of measurement only holds true, however, when the instrument measuring, either the naked eye or an assistive device, measures accurately. Otherwise, distance distorts, perspective becomes warped, perception is utterly unreliable and truth is lost.

The reaction in some quarters to the SARS (severe acute respiratory syndrome) situation in Greater Toronto is a case in point.

The World Health Organization (WHO) rocked Canadian health agencies and all three levels of government last week when it issued an advisory warning against travel to the Toronto area. The Geneva-based organization's press release carried sufficient public relations weight to ensure that SARS-in-Toronto instantly became one of the lead items on network news shows all around the world.

But the medical facts of the situation in Toronto did not warrant the WHO reaction; nor do they warrant the fallout that resulted from the WHO warning. Indeed, as of this writing, the ban is under review and might be modified, if not rescinded, even before this issue of The CJN reaches its readers. Canadian officials sent updated information to WHO and they assume an adjustment to the advisory will be forthcoming. A spokesperson for WHO virtually promised as much when he admitted on the weekend that the organization may have acted prematurely in issuing the travel warning.

As of last Sunday, there were 269 probable and suspected SARS cases in the Toronto area. Twenty-one people, alas, had died from the disease. But there had not been any new SARS infection from secondary sources in nearly a month.

The new SARS cases stemmed from direct contact with an infected individual and most, though not all, of the people who succumbed to the disease had other, complicating, pre-existing medical conditions as well. Moreover, according to health officials, some 95 per cent of the individuals who have contracted the disease thus far have recovered.

There is no denying that the situation is very serious. But because of the inaccurate lens – WHO – through which Toronto's situation has been measured, the perspective has become warped, fostering almost a quasi-hysteria in the outside world's perception of SARS-in-Toronto.

Many organizations in Toronto where large numbers of the public gather, including most synagogues, have adopted anti-SARS protocols to minimize opportunities for possible infection. But in the main, it is prudence, not suspicion, that governs. And it is compassion, not disassociation, that is the rule.

WHO's pronouncement confirmed in the worried and wavering minds of many individuals who were on their way to the Toronto area, that they should cancel their plans. Thus, many conferences and concerts scheduled and already booked for Toronto have been cancelled.

Tourists are staying away. The wide, interwoven web of tourism-related businesses is suffering. As a result, many jobs are being jeopardized. And thus, a not-insignificant threat to the overall economy looms rather menacingly.

The impact of the rampant Toronto avoidance, not surprisingly, has also effected the Jewish community.

A highly-regarded scholar and motivational speaker from Israel cancelled a lecture he was scheduled to deliver next month at a large synagogue.

Even more cutting was the cancellation of a mission to Israel originating in western Canada, largely because of concern about SARS in Toronto. Many of the passengers allegedly felt uncomfortable because the flight was scheduled to stop in Toronto and collect some passengers there.

In the result, certain observations beg to be made:

- We owe a great debt to the health-care workers who are the first-line battlers against this profoundly vexing and troubling disease. When they go to work, they risk a great deal more than we do. Their perseverance, dedication and courage are a great example to us.
- The SARS situation poignantly and painfully illustrates the deeply embedded, structural interdependence between individual well-being, narrowly defined, and societal well-being, broadly defined.
- As a result of this interdependence, it is strategically imperative – not to mention, of course, morally imperative as well – to achieve and maintain the highest possible standard of medical care for our society.
- The Toronto-avoidance response has enabled us more vividly, more directly and more personally to empathize with the Israel-avoidance response that still characterizes most North Americans' reaction to the situation there. Both cases are marked by dangers, to be sure. But the true dimension of that danger has been distorted through distance by the instruments whose perceptions have purported to depict for us the reality, but which have, in truth, merely conveyed warped perspectives.

In this week's issue we debut the reportage of Svetlana Barkan, a freelancer who, along with other new freelancers, will, in the coming weeks, help us better report on the news of the burgeoning Russian Jewish community in the Greater Toronto Area.

Shaarei Shomayim students see tribute to Ramon

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

It's been two months since Israeli astronaut Ilan Ramon died with his American cohorts when the Space Shuttle Columbia disintegrated on re-entry into the earth's atmosphere Feb. 1.

The day after the tragedy, when most of the world was still in shock, David Weinberg was busy creating a slide show about Ramon and his accomplishments.

David Weinberg

The presentation, which was used Feb. 3 in a memorial service by Yeshiva University where Weinberg is a student, was picked up by Fox TV and ABC, which both later aired part of the show. Weinberg, who is from Toronto, was also interviewed by NBC, CBS, Newsday and USA Today.

Weinberg's slide show, which combines music from the movie Apollo 13 with images of Ramon and his achievements, was shown at Shaarei Shomayim Synagogue last month as part of an evening devoted to space. The Yetta Nashman Jewish Family Institute (JFI) sponsored the event as part of its family-focused learning opportunities. NASA astronaut Guy Gardner was also present to share his space experiences.

JFI representative Bronwyn Sheppard said the tribute to Ramon is only part of the story.

"Guy Gardner teaches us about space, human achievement and how to pursue your dreams and achieve your potential," she said.

Weinberg noted that the Ramon story ties the Jewish element into the narrative.

"Ramon represents the ability of the Jewish people to endure" despite all tragedies, he said.

SARS claims second Jewish victim

SARS, severe acute respiratory syndrome, has claimed another Jewish victim in Toronto.

Rose Pollack died April 12, just a few weeks after her husband, Joseph, died of the same disease. Her funeral was at Bathurst Lawn Cemetery the following Monday.

Joseph Pollack was one of the first Canadian SARS patients. He contracted it when he was placed in the same room as a SARS patient at Scarborough Hospital, Grace Division.

The burial of a suspected SARS victim at Pardes Shalom cemetery led to Ontario Association of Cemeteries-mandated precautions for the cemetery staff, including gloves and masks.

A coroner's report proved that it was a false alarm.

Former McGill principal to be honoured

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

If you ask Bernard Shapiro – the former principal and vice-chancellor of McGill University – about his legacy, he practically changes the subject.

"I do not think in terms so personal as legacy," he said in an interview.

"It is for others to say just what my achievements at McGill were," said Shapiro, who will be honoured by The Learning Partnership at a dinner in Toronto on May 8 for his contributions to public education.

The Learning Partnership is a charitable organization dedicated to strengthening public education in Canada.

Despite his reluctance to dwell on himself, Shapiro, who headed McGill from 1994 until last summer, admits he left it better equipped to face the future.

In an ambitious reconstruction project, the likes of which had not been seen on the Montreal campus in about four decades, Shapiro oversaw the construction of a new library, a new music building, a new student centre and a new building devoted to research in genetics.

Shapiro also eliminated McGill's accumulated debt, doubled the inflow of philanthropic gifts, developed the School for the Environment, beefed up the library collections and raised the proportion of international students.

He also started outreach programs to francophone students in Quebec. "My overall enrolment model was to have half of our students from McGill – divided equally between francophones and anglophones – and half from outside Quebec, divided equally between Canadians and international students."

Present enrolment figures are very close to this objective, Shapiro said.

Most important, he successfully launched a faculty renewal program whereby 100 new professors are brought to McGill each year.

"I have no regrets," he said. "I left the principalship at this time because I felt I had done as much as I had it in me to do and that, therefore, it was time for fresh leadership."

His successor, Heather Monroe-Blum, was the University of Toronto's vice-principal.

Officially, Shapiro retires on Jan. 1, 2005. But until then, he is on sabbatical leave.

His greatest disappointment, he acknowledged, was his inability to convince the Quebec government of "the appropriate place and value of universities to the future of our community."

McGill requires about an extra $80 million per year to operate at properly funded levels, he noted.

But McGill's problem is hardly unique. As he put it, "The question of the adequate funding for all Canadian research universities remains unsettled."

Asked whether he was hard-pressed to administer McGill during an era of government cutbacks, he replied, "It was difficult but certainly not impossible. I do not recall ever throwing up my hands in despair."

He added: "The government was not right in being simultaneously parsimonious in its grants and freezing tuition. This simply undermined the quality of the education available to young persons, since in the 'free trade' of gray matter, Canadian universities must compete with their American counterparts if Canada is to achieve its own objectives."

Nevertheless, the federal government has been "very responsive" to universities through such programs as the Canadian Foundation for Innovation and the Millennium Scholarships, he pointed out.

Shapiro was the first Jewish principal of McGill, which once restricted the number of Jewish students on campus.

"It was very exciting for me to note that Jewishness was no longer a barrier – perceived or real – to the appointment. It gave me some confidence that over time, things can improve."

Shapiro concedes he was not that eager to accept the principalship when it was offered.

He had just retired from the Ontario Public Service, having held a series of senior posts, including deputy minister of education, and intended to work only on a part-time basis.

"I found, however, that the challenge of McGill was irresistible. In choosing to come to McGill, I made what I regard as one of the best choices in my professional and personal life."

Bernard Shapiro

Born and raised in the Montreal suburb of Hampstead, the son of Mary and Max Shapiro, he graduated from McGill in 1956, majoring in economics and political science.

As top student in the faculty of arts, he won the Alan Oliver Gold Medal.

Shortly after graduation, he and his twin brother, Harold, a future president of Princeton University, took over and managed the famous family business – the Ruby Foo's Chinese restaurant – for several years. They sold it in 1961.

"I like Chinese food, though I did not care for it as a youngster," he said.

Leaving Montreal, Shapiro took a doctorate in education at Harvard. In 1967, he joined the faculty of Boston University, where he was later associate dean of its school of education.

Returning to Canada, Shapiro was dean of the University of Western Ontario's faculty of education and then the university's vice-president.

From 1980 until 1986, he was director of the Ontario Institute for Studies in Education.

After a six-year stint as an Ontario civil servant, he joined the University of Toronto as a professor of education and public policy.

His wife Phyllis also taught at the University of Toronto as a professor of education.

They have two married children: Arlene Cooper, who lives in Richmond Hill, Ont., and Marvin, who resides in Maitland, Fla.

Shapiro is not certain what his future holds. "I am not at all sure just what I will do."

Yet he is quite busy. He chairs the selection committee that will choose the next music director of the Montreal Symphony Orchestra, and is co-chair of the Societe du Havre, an agency charged with redeveloping Montreal's harbourfront.

In addition, he chairs the board of the Royal Military College and the Canadian Bureau of International Education.

Shapiro, who intends to go on living in Montreal, is active in the Jewish community, being vice-president of Shaar Hashomayim Synagogue and of CJA Federation.

Most recently, he signed on as a volunteer consultant to the National Jewish Population Study, sponsored by the United Jewish Communities in New York.

Outside academia, he maintains an interest in keyboard instruments and reads ceaselessly, particularly in intellectual history.

He and his wife collect Japanese porcelain.

Radio program fights anti-Israel bias in media

By STACEY STEIN
Special to The CJN

Radio host Rabbi Tovia Singer loves dismantling the anti-Israel arguments voiced by those who are committed to undermining the Jewish state.

Singer is the host of The Tovia Singer Show, which is dedicated to countering anti-Israel bias in the mainstream media by analyzing current events and featuring thought-provoking guests who discuss Jewish issues. While many of the show's listeners are very supportive of its pro-Israel stance, others are critical of the show's take on current events.

"When people call in challenging the fundamental aspects of the Jewish state, that's an opportunity to listen and learn how to respond," said Singer, a New York-based public speaker who lectures widely in North America, Europe and Israel. "The purpose of the show is to expose the arguments that are designed to smear the Jewish state."

Launched in January 2002, The Tovia Singer Show is the brainchild of Torontonian Rachelle Bronfman, who used her own funds to start the program, which continues to be funded entirely through private donations.

"I was sick of the bias against Israel in the media," said Bronfman. "The media is so critical of Israel – every time Israel does something to defend itself, it gets criticized." Spurred by her frustration, Bronfman decided to launch a radio show to provide a counterbalance to the anti-Israel rhetoric colouring the media landscape.

"I felt I had to do something to try and make a difference," she said. "So this is what I've chosen to do."

Lacking any formal training in radio, Bronfman rented a studio and learned how to produce the show. She now has 14 people working for the program, including nine based in Toronto, where it's produced. The show was first broadcast by two New York area radio stations, but was picked up by Arutz 7, Israel's National News radio, in October 2002 and is also broadcast live around the world via the Internet.

The two-hour program opens with Singer speaking on a current issue or recent event, and then features a guest speaker before opening to questions from listeners around the world.

The show's roster of guests have included comedian Jackie Mason, media magnate Israel Asper, Rabbi Marvin Hier, Middle East expert Daniel Pipes and lawyer Alan Dershowitz, among many others. Bronfman said one of the "heaviest" shows featured Dr. Judea Pearl, who spoke on the yahrzeit of his son, slain Wall Street Journal correspondent Daniel Pearl.

The show attracts listeners from all over the world – callers from countries as far-flung as Bahrain, Egypt and Australia have phoned in to weigh in on the issues and speak with Singer.

The show also receives a lot of calls from Canadian listeners, many of whom Singer said are "perplexed by the Liberals' stance toward Israel." He added that anti-Israel bias is rampant in the Canadian media.

"In the television and radio media in Canada, there is an anti-Israel bias presenting the state of Israel as an aggressor and not addressing the issue of terrorism that is beleaguering the state," Singer said.

According to Singer, 75 per cent of callers are pro-Israel and pro-U.S., while 25 per cent are hostile to the United States and Israel. Singer said the show thrives off the latter segment of listeners.

Bronfman echoed Singer's sentiments about the importance of airing the dissenting viewpoints expressed by some callers.

"We want people to call in that are anti-Semitic because we want to be able to dismantle them," said Bronfman. "We want to take their arguments and dissect them and show that these arguments are based on lies or mistruths." Bronfman said the show is also looking to bring on more controversial guests, such as representatives from Peace Now, an Israel-based movement which advocates reconciliation with the Palestinians.

Bronfman wants the show to reach a wider, more mainstream audience. Her goal is for the show to be picked up by a syndicator or by mainstream radio or television. To help realize this goal, Bronfman is currently in negotiations to produce a pilot for TV, which would feature Singer as the host.

"We have to have a voice that works," Bronfman said. "It's not enough to have a brilliant person come out on CNN and speak for two seconds. We have to have a place to go for [everyone] who is not connected to these issues.

"All I care about is that we have a voice for the Jewish people and that people will tune in and listen and those gentiles or Jews who criticize Israel or really don't understand the issues will get it. Finally."

The Tovia Singer Show airs every Tuesday at 3 p.m. on www.toviasinger.com. For more information on the show, please e-mail Rachelle Bronfman at RB18@sympatico.ca.

New beginning or opportunity lost?

Mahmoud Abbas, also known as Abu Mazen, is the prime minister-designate of the Palestinian Authority. But we still do not have a clear idea of the executive and/or administrative authority commanded by his office. Nor do we know the nature of the constitutional relationship between the position of prime minister and that of the president. The latter post is still occupied by Yasser Arafat, also known as Abu Amar.

Abbas is scheduled to be confirmed in his position by the Palestinian Legislative Assembly sometime this week. Once confirmed, he will be visited by U.S. Secretary of State Colin Powell who will, symbolically at least, place his hands of blessing upon the forehead of the new Palestinian prime minister. That very public act will set in motion a veritable parade of visiting dignitaries who will, in their turn, also confer similar blessings of authority and recognition on the new prime minister.

Mahmoud Abbas

Israel's prime minister, Ariel Sharon, has already extended, if cautiously, a positive hand towards Abbas. He wants Abbas to succeed and has, for the moment, cast aside whatever legitimate reservations he may have concerning Abbas and his past. For, Abbas' success will mean success for Israel as well.

The first indications of Abbas' intentions appear encouraging. On the weekend, he told European diplomats that he will use his inaugural speech to the Palestinian Legislative Council to declare an end to the use of arms to achieve Palestinian national aspirations.

Inasmuch as Israel and the world have heard those very same words before, namely at the White House lawn and at Wye Plantation, spoken loudly but falsely by Arafat, we will suspend judgement on Abu Mazen until his deeds match his words. We do however, fervently hope he is honest in his intentions.

In truth, however, for Abbas to succeed, Arafat must fail – abjectly and totally – in his designs to retain control over the governing Palestinian apparatus. Arafat has countless times proven his murderous duplicity to the entire world. He has bleakly and bloodily set back the cause of his own people.

It is therefore both puzzling and distressing to watch as visiting foreign officials, such as Japanese Foreign Minister Yoriko Kawaguchi, persist in their determination to resurrect Arafat's credibility.

Abu Mazen must be freed of Arafat's controlling hands. Only then will we be able to measure the worthiness of his declarations against the integrity of his efforts. And only then, too, will we be able to know if this is truly a new beginning for the Palestinians or merely another opportunity squandered.

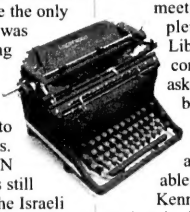
BQ's flawed logic

On March 31, 2003, Bloc Québécois MP Christiane Gagnon tabled a petition in the House of Commons opposing the Israeli army's occupation of Palestinian territory. Gagnon and her petitioners call on the Canadian government to demand that Israel "cease massacres in Palestine and withdraw without further delay from the territories."

Gagnon bases her petition on the flawed logic that Israel is not complying with United Nations resolutions and that this is comparable to the war in Iraq for non-compliance with UN resolutions. I suggest that Gagnon study the history of the Mideast conflict and the United Nations resolutions more carefully before she attempts any linkages between Iraq and Israel.

The Mideast peace talks of July 2000 between former Israelis prime minister Barak and Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat led to an agreement on guiding principles, one of which was directly connected to UN resolutions 242 and 338. The statement issued after the talks at Camp David stated that "both sides agree that negotiations based on UN Security Council Resolutions 242 and 338 are the only way to achieve such an agreement." The idea was to end decades of conflict and achieve a lasting peace.



What Gagnon fails to understand in comparing Israel to Iraq is that the UN Resolutions regarding the Mideast conflict put obligations to comply on both the Palestinians and the Israelis. The Palestinians have not met their UN obligations. In fact, the Palestinian authorities still fail to recognize the State of Israel, yet it is the Israeli people who are blamed by Gagnon and her petitioners. By comparison, UN resolutions on Iraq required the compliance of only Saddam Hussein.

Gagnon's actions do not contribute to the peace process in the region and are confusing to say the least. Comparing Israel to one of the world's worst regimes is simply wrong, and this petition is ill-timed, inappropriate and unhelpful.

Getting an education

Lawrence Gaum's absurd and wholly erroneous thesis in his letter (CJN, April 16, 2003) is clearly based on a misunderstanding of the word "education."

University should not only be about showing up to class, turning in papers, and leaving with your A. Education is the process by which we teach students how to be responsible, contributing members of society. If Gaum thinks these lessons are taught in biology class, he's wrong.

Universities are microcosms of society. Students take classes and earn degrees, and learn valuable life lessons in their free time. Today's campus protesters are tomorrow's politicians. Today's campus activists are tomorrow's leaders of Jewish community organizations.

As Jews, we cannot believe that life is merely about having a job and earning a living. It must also be about helping the community through political activism, social justice, public awareness and informal education.

Too many students do what Gaum recommends and limit themselves to a self-centred pursuit of individual goals and achievements. Many of these same students later complain that the atmosphere for Jews on their campuses is not to their liking.

To these uninvolved students, I say "Stand up and make your voices heard."

To Gaum, I say, "Sit down and listen."

It is amusing that Gaum's letter appeared so close to Pesach. I wonder what might have happened had someone told Moses to stop his "frivolous" struggle for freedom and instead "do something constructive."

Liberals, NDP disappoint

I was disappointed to read about the remarks of MPPs Gerard Kennedy and Michael Prue on the Equality in Education Tax credit at the recent Canadian Jewish Congress meeting. ("Eves defends education tax cut at CJC plenary," CJN, April 3). Kennedy suggested a Liberal government would remove this credit and concentrate on public education in Ontario. When asked if he had any suggestions as what would work better than the tax credit, Kennedy said he had no alternatives, and that there are no easy answers (which I interpret to mean that no answers would be forthcoming for the foreseeable future).

Kennedy fails to realize that this tax credit was introduced primarily to redress a long-standing inequality in the funding of religious schools. Catholics in Ontario have always received full funding for their religiously based school system, a privilege no other religion has. Although based on historical precedent, this practice is out of touch with Ontario's current multicultural makeup. Furthermore, it is discriminatory, as has been noted by the United Nations and as is obvious to anyone who considers the issue. As well, most beneficiaries of this credit are middle class citizens who are struggling with their tuition bills, in contrast to the stereotype that it's primarily for the wealthy.

Prue of the NDP said his party is against the tax credit, but would support some form of religious elective within the public system, presumably a class that would take up, at most, a few hours a week. With our need to teach our children a second language, a knowledge of Torah and a commitment to our traditions, such an elective would simply not be effective.

Supporting all religious schools in no way detracts from the role of public schools. Indeed, we are all working together for the common good of this province in our own ways. Jewish day schools, as well as those of other religions, also teach a full range of secular subjects and train children to be productive members of society, proud of their own heritage while respecting others. It is unfortunate that only the Progressive Conservative Party has been able see the benefits of funding all religious schools.

How the founding of Israel has affected our faith

To commemorate the 55th anniversary of the founding of the State of Israel (the fifth day of Iyar) – which falls this year on May 7 – The CJN has commissioned a number of essays that explore various aspects of the anniversary. The essays will appear periodically over the next few weeks.

By MARTIN LOCKSHIN

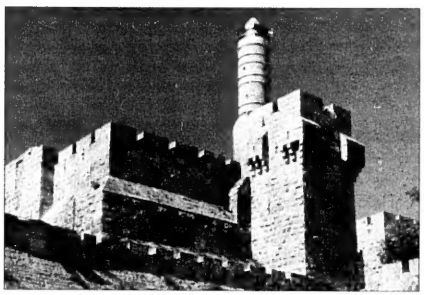
Much has changed in the world since 1948 when the State of Israel was established – Jewish identity, Jewish pride and Jewish self-perceptions. Has the Jewish religion also evolved as a result of the establishment of the state?

The State of Israel has definitely caused some surprising metamorphoses in two other religions—Christianity and Islam.

Several classical Christian religious doctrines belittled or denigrated Jews. First, the accusation of deicide: For generations, many if not most Christians were taught that Jews were collectively guilty of the worst crime imaginable – the murder of God.

Next, the doctrine of supersessionism taught that the Jewish religion was an outdated anachronistic fossil. Anyone who insisted on clinging to the old washed-up religion (Judaism) was foolish, if not worse, since it had been replaced by a far superior product (Christianity).

Lastly, Christianity taught that the powerlessness of the Jews was irrefutable proof of God's displeasure with Jews and Judaism. Jews were the eternal homeless wanderers, and so it was argued, they ought to be. If the biblical Cain was turned into "a ceaseless wanderer on earth" (Genesis 4:12) as punishment for the crime of fratricide, surely Jews deserved punishment at least that severe, as punishment for the crime of deicide.



The Tower of David in Jerusalem

The clarity and pervasiveness of these anti-Jewish attitudes and texts made many Jews, myself included, certain a couple of decades ago that Christianity would never succeed in coming to terms with Jewish power and with the State of Israel.

It made sense that the Pope would not visit the State of Israel and that the Vatican would refuse to recognize a Jewish state. When I taught my students classical Christian theology about Jews, we always concluded that serious Christians must understandably find a Jewish state problematic.

But we were wrong. Christian theology has been able to come to terms with the re-establishment of Jewish sovereignty in Israel. Serious fundamentalist Protestants are today some of the best friends that Israel has. The Pope still criticizes Israel far too much for most of our tastes but he has visited there and has normalized relations with the state.

Parallel to these salutary developments in Christendom, we have witnessed in the last few years a serious deterioration in Muslim attitudes to Jews and Jewish power. In a recent chilling publication (Muslim Anti-Semitism: A Clear and Present Danger), Prof. Robert S. Wistrich of the Hebrew University, demonstrates that we can now find in Muslim countries texts that rival the vitriol of the anti-Jewish writings of Nazi Germany.

Careful scholars point out that the Muslim attitude to Jews was hardly always "golden." There are troubling anti-Jewish passages in the Koran; the Jews were rarely granted anything above second-class status (or worse) in Muslim lands. Still the intensity of historical Christianity's anti-Jewishness is not part of classical Islam.

As Wistrich writes (p. 7): Jews under Islam were in a relatively better condition than their coreligionists in Christian lands. They did not, for instance, carry the theological odium of Christ-killers as a mark of Cain on their brows. The more self-confident medieval Muslims did not feel the same compulsion as their Christian counterparts to negate Judaism as a religion, to engage in endless denigratory polemics against its validity, or to replace the "Old Covenant" with a new Israel of the spirit.

In other words, judging simply on the basis of its historical theology, Islam ought to have a more positive attitude than Christianity to Jews and Jewish sovereignty today. But the truth is very different: Devout Christians support the State of Israel enthusiastically, while vile anti-Semitic canards—the Protocols of the Elders of Zion, or charges that the Jews are child molesters and well poisoners—now have shockingly wide circulation in Islamic countries.

The establishment of the State of Israel was obviously the confounding factor. It was the prime cause for the unprecedented growth of Muslim anti-Semitism. At the same time, once Christians came to peace (not right away, mind you) with the idea that the State of Israel was here to stay they made the necessary theological adjustments to their religion, for the good.

It is tempting to conclude that theology doesn't really matter as much as geopolitical considerations. Or perhaps, to phrase it more generously, both modern Islam and modern Christianity could find in their traditional holy texts many disparate texts about Jews, both positive and negative. New realities, like the establishment of the State of Israel, affect the choices that believing Christians and Muslims make among those texts.

A similar pattern of changes has taken place within Judaism because of the State of Israel. One hundred years ago the vast majority of rabbis — both Reform and Orthodox — were opponents of the Zionist movement. Today almost all Jews see the establishment of the State as a wonderful event.

Classical Judaism consists of a wide variety of texts that balance the roles of humans and God in history. Some texts suggest that it is pretentious for Jews to try to force God's hand and that the Jews will be liberated only by God, through supernatural events. Other texts suggest that Jews should take an active role in their own liberation.

One hundred years ago, when very few Jews thought that the Zionist movement had any chance of succeeding, theologians tended to cite the first group of texts. Since Israel was established and has prospered, only the tiniest group of haredi Jews (the Neturei Karta) continues to promote the theology of waiting for God to act. Jews of almost all denominations have made the State of Israel part of their world view.

Aside from accepting the idea of a Jewish state established through human effort, has Jewish theology changed in other ways?

Immediately after the Six Day War, messianic fervour was rampant in Jewish religious circles. Gush Emunim (the "Bloc of the Faithful") based much of its world view on the assumptions that (1) the messianic process was proceeding inexorably before our very eyes; and (2) it was unthinkable for Jews to do anything that might slow down that messianic process.

Public debate in Israel was often stymied by these determinations. The country could, at one point, be divided into two groups: one group which thought that events should be analyzed and reacted to in a rational manner, based on standard geopolitical or economic or military arguments, and a second group that felt that Jewish reactions to demographic or military threats ought to be based primarily on the recognition of the unfolding messianic process.

The messianic world view, never very popular outside of limited religious circles, now has relatively few Jewish proponents. Particularly when Israelis have been subjected to frequent merciless and random terror attacks for more than two years, it is hard for rabbis to promote the idea that God's messianic plan is apparent. Gush Emunim theology appears to be a spent force in Judaism.

Are there any other identifiable changes in Jewish theology now that the State of Israel has been created? I would argue that there has been an important development that has not been sufficiently noted.

Western religions generally believe that things of consequence in this world come into being due to a combination of the efforts of God and of human beings. For the last two millennia (since the failure of the Bar Kochba revolt), religious Jews have been inclined to see the role of humans in world developments as minor. Geopolitically and militarily, Jews were able to accomplish very little through their own efforts. Jewish theology became, for the most part, one of dependence on God to shape world events. The only action expected from Jews was to observe God's mitzvot.

The last 50 years have witnessed a serious shift away from such thinking. While most religious Jews (myself included) feel that God has played in a role in the restoration of the Jewish nation, we admit that humans, too, played a very significant role in that restoration.

As a result of the creation of a strong State of Israel, Jewish theology today, in virtually all movements, sees a significant place for human effort in the unfolding of world events. Prayer for God's help and intervention is still crucial to religion but it is no longer accompanied by religious quietism. Religious Jews have re-entered the world of political and military activism and they are unlikely to leave it any time soon.

Maximizing your 15 minutes

"You can't summarize a life in 15 minutes" is an oft-repeated platitude. While it's true that you can't recite a person's biography in 15 minutes, you can summarize a life in 15 minutes. I know this, because I summarize lives all the time. I give eulogies.

Rabbi Chaim Steinmetz in Montreal

Eulogies are more than mere summaries. When I perform a funeral for someone I didn't know, often when I meet the families, they are (understandably) quite nervous.

"You must mention this," a family member will admonish me, as they recite critical information. Certain phrases are repeated compulsively, trying to make certain that I, an outsider, get the story right. It's important to the family, because the eulogy is no mere summary. Rather, it is a public statement of legacy and memory. And legacies matter.

No one wants to live a forgettable life. This is not due to vanity. It is an essential, existential need. Man's most powerful quest is the search for meaning. We hope that we've made a genuine contribution, that the sum total of our labours will have made this world a better place. And after all is said and done, we hope that's how everyone else remembers us as well.

Maybe it's because I'm closing in on 40, or maybe it's because I attend too many funerals, but I've started to think about my own legacy. Perhaps it's odd, but at funerals, when I listen to the family pay tribute, I wonder what the 15-minute summary of my life will sound like. I suspect I'm not alone in doing this, that many of you think about your legacies as well.

My experience at funerals has taught me what a real legacy sounds like. First off, (for those of you in the market for sports cars), in the nearly 300 funerals I have been to, not once has the deceased's car been mentioned. Nor have the person's children spoken about how large his house was or which caterer he used for simchahs.

These may be biographical facts, but they aren't a part of a legacy.

The eulogies that I remember years later are about mothers who worked full time to support their family, and woke up at 3 a.m. to cook dinner; about teenagers who volunteered to fight in the Israeli army during the War of Independence; about grandmothers who lovingly baked cookies; about Holocaust survivors who had the courage to survive and rebuild; about restaurant owners who regularly fed hoboes.

Genuine legacies are made of love and courage, determination and devotion.

Biographies can takes hours to recite, only to be forgotten immediately. Legacies can be summarized in a few short minutes, but they're always unforgettable. For my 15-minute summary, I'm striving for an authentic legacy.

Shas' changing fortunes alters political landscape

One of the most dramatic results of last February's election in Israel is the absence of the haredi party Shas from the second Sharon government. The impact of this is only now beginning to be felt.

Shira Herzog in Toronto

Shas was formed in the early 1980s as a party of dissent. It challenged the dominance of Ashkenazi haredi parties, and it brought an unprecedented ethnic, socio-economic base to religious politics in Israel. Shas' learned spiritual leader, Rabbi Ovadia Yossef, and its charismatic political leader, Aryeh Deri, reflected a growing body of Talmudic scholars of Sephardi origin. While trained in traditional Ashkenazi yeshivas, they sought to establish an independent political power base using ethnic discontent as the hook. And over the course of almost two decades, Shas redrew the map of Israeli politics.

The party's political power made it a key partner in coalition governments, and it was awarded significant portfolios, such as the interior and welfare ministries. Under Deri's shrewd leadership, Shas channelled huge government allocations to a vast network of social service and educational institutions at a level far greater than that of other, publicly funded, services. The result was a steady, incremental growth support for Shas, especially from low-income Israelis.

It took about 15 years for Shas' fortunes to turn. It exploited its power too much, too early in its meteoric political career – even in Israel's bazaar-like marketplace of coalition politics. Nearly 10 years ago, Deri was convicted of fraudulently allocating public funds to organizations that supported him politically (which many of his supporters claimed was no worse than the behaviour of other politicians).

Deri's successor as party leader, Eli Yishai, lacked his charisma and political sophistication, thereby fuelling resentment of his party's practices in the broader Israeli community. More importantly, Shas found itself increasingly unpopular in its effort to straddle both sides of the Israeli fence. Its followers continued to take advantage of the historic exemption from military service available to haredi yeshiva students, while its political leaders exploited their political clout to the utmost and shamelessly milked the public coffers.

The resulting public anger contributed to the success of the Shinui party in the last election. Shinui's outspoken leader, Tommy Lapid, ran on a blatantly anti-haredi platform and pledged to join any coalition that left Shas in opposition. In fact, Prime Minister Ariel Sharon chose Shinui over Shas when he formed his latest coalition.

For the first time in nearly two decades, Shas now finds itself on the opposition benches of the Knesset, while its hold on policies and allocations in various areas is quickly dwindling. But the impact of Shas' changed fortunes goes much deeper – especially at this time. Its traditional constituency is the first to suffer from the country's economic crisis and the accelerated dismantling of the Israeli welfare state. As the numbers of unemployed swell and the social safety net shrinks, Shas is losing its pre-eminence as the social advocate of the poor. The trade union federation, the Histadrut, is re-emerging into that very role.

The fiery Histadrut leader, Amir Peretz, recently won the first round in his battle against Finance Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's radical economic plan, but the critical showdown was to come after the Passover break. Whatever the outcome, thousands of mature yeshiva students with large families will face reduced income, both because of reduced public allocations and Shas' inability to guarantee additional, politically based subsidies.

This may finally bring to a head the long-standing debate over the link between the military exemption and guaranteed welfare incomes. The majority of these students remain in yeshivas in order to avoid military service – and they lose the military exemption once they enter the workforce. Last year, the Tal Law was passed in an effort to break this deadlock. It allows yeshiva students to work for a trial year without an automatic military draft. In a changed political environment, Shas' rabbis are less likely to resist this option, and on the merits, this may be a positive development.

Shas will likely retain a core base of support that will guarantee it approximately 10 Knesset seats, but its power has been irrevocably reduced. In an always-volatile political climate, the deeper and broader impact of this will become clearer over the coming years.

We are what we eat

Passover, like many Jewish holidays, is about food. Of course, it's not only about food, or even mainly about food. But even as Jews recall the Exodus from Egypt and ponder the meaning of their liberation from slavery, they eat.

Morton Weinfeld in Montreal

Food plays a number of roles. For many Jews, eating matzah – with its dire consequence for the digestive tract – and avoiding chametz defines the holiday. The seder plate identifies symbolic foods that Jews are commanded to eat as part of the holiday ritual. Indeed, the fact Jews are obliged to drink four glasses of wine, if not more, sets the holiday apart from all others, with the exception of Purim, when Jews are encouraged to drink to excess.

The seder meals themselves have become lavish feasts. Over-indulgence is the rule. Jews also take a perverse pride in trying to host as many guests as possible, in a Jackie Mason-like version of "mine is bigger than yours." Twelve, 16, 24, 30 – the larger the number, the greater the status.

Menus have also expanded over the decades. It used to be that gefilte fish, chicken soup, roast chicken, a kugel and/or tzimmes, and macaroons and jellied candies – remember them? – for dessert would comprise a respectable meal. No longer.

This year, for the first time, we catered our seder, ordering a pre-set package deal. We did not know what to expect. While our guests numbered a moderate 14, the menu somehow got out of control.

For entrées, there was chopped liver, eggplant salad and gefilte fish, followed by chicken soup with matzah balls.

The main courses included stuffed cabbage rolls, brisket, stuffed chicken, chicken schnitzel, pineapple chicken, turkey roll and two kinds of meatballs, one with a tomato sauce and one with a cranberry sauce.

Side dishes included asparagus, potato kugel, a "noodle" kugel, carrot tzimmes and a green salad. Dessert options were sherbet, chocolates, apple pie, chocolate cake and fresh fruit salad.

Most of the food came from a caterer. (And to our surprise, as we had always relied on home cooking, the food was tasty, and reasonably priced.) But we added the cranberry meatballs, the turkey roll, the pineapple chicken and the green salad because of an unfounded and thoroughly irrational fear that there might not be enough.

Of course, this was ridiculous. There was more food than we had ever enjoyed at a seder. We will not overdo it again next year. But I have discovered that many other seder meals have become increasingly elaborate, and some feature fancy gourmet dishes far removed from the fare we recall from earlier decades.

Along with this trend has come the transformation of matzah and related products. No longer is there one type of matzah and few dessert options for Passover. With greater affluence has come a variety of matzot, including onion, garlic, chocolate and whole wheat, among others. Moreover, ingenuity with matzah meal has lead to all manner of cookies and cakes, some of which are actually quite acceptable.

What to make of all this? My initial reaction is to criticize this excess, including my own. It should be clear to all Jews how far removed this lavishness is from the "bread of affliction" and the story of slavery in Egypt. Surely, the meaning of the holiday is undermined by all this conspicuous consumption.

But this is only part of the story. Chronic overeating by Jews at the seders, and on Passover generally, can be taken as a celebration of freedom, and of life itself. We remember slavery, and we remember its antithesis. The expanding array of Passover foods reflects a Jewish determination to celebrate holidays to the maximum. In a sense, they make it easier to be an observant Jew.

There is a delicate Passover balance at present between two opposing forces. On the one hand, we have the seductions of affluence and Jewish commercialism. On the other, we have the natural urge among Jews (found among other religious traditions on key holidays) to maximize the festive nature of the central meal, which is as much a social occasion that bonds families to each other and to the community as it is part of a religious holiday.

One hopes this equilibrium is maintained into the future. In the meantime, pass the kugel.

The Kirshner File

A selection from the Jewish Film Festival

This year's Jewish Film Festival in Toronto runs from May 3-11 at the Bloor Cinema and presents a bumper crop of intriguing movies. A sampler:

The Nazi Officer's Wife (Friday, May 9 at 11 a.m.), a first-rate documentary turning on such universal themes as identity and love, revolves around a Viennese Jewish law student who survived the Holocaust by marrying a member of the Nazi party. Liz Garbus tells her incredible, perhaps unique, story with immense skill.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Born in 1914 into an assimilated family, Edith Hahn witnessed the German occupation and Nazification of Austria. Remaining in Austria, she battled fear and confusion, desperate not to be torn away from her half-Jewish boyfriend, Peppy Rosenfeld. She and her mother (Hahn's father died in 1936) were summarily evicted from their home, then forced into a ghetto in Vienna. Subsequently, Hahn was sent as a slave labourer to a farm in Germany. She never saw her mother – to whom she was close – again.

Returning to Vienna 13 months later, Hahn made two major decisions that could have been fatal. She failed to report to the Gestapo and removed her mandatory yellow star, going into hiding. Through various manoeuvres that required Hahn to put her trust in two Viennese Nazis, she assumed the identity of Crystl Denner, a younger non-Jewish woman whom she had tutored. Armed with new papers, she travelled to Munich, where she found a job as a Red Cross nurses' aide.

Edith Hahn

At an art gallery, she met Werner Vetter, a committed Nazi and anti-Semite who fell in love with her. After he proposed marriage, she admitted she was Jewish. It's not entirely clear why Vetter did not report Hahn to the authorities. They were married, and in 1944 she gave birth to a daughter, Maria Angelica. By all appearances, Hahn seemed like a typical German housewife. But inside, she felt buried alive. Conscripted into the army, Vetter was captured by Soviet forces and imprisoned. Very soon after the war, when Hahn reclaimed her Jewish identity, she was appointed a judge. Vetter, still a Nazi, returned in 1947. Their marriage broke up and they went their separate ways.

The film, narrated by Susan Sarandon and Julia Ormond, is non-judgmental and is never less than compelling.

Shanghai Ghetto (Sunday, May 11 at 5 p.m.), by Dana Janklowicz and Amir Mann, tells quite a tale. The bustling Chinese city of Shanghai, captured by Japan in 1937, was the only place where persecuted European Jews could settle without a visa. As a result, thousands of Jews, particularly those from Germany, flooded into this cosmopolitan commercial centre. There they encountered "a whole different world," as one of the refugees puts it. All but penniless, they settled in Hong Kew, a congested neighbourhood of dimly-lit alleys and open sewers.

The new arrivals were helped by Baghdadi Jews, British subjects who had come to Shanghai about a century before, and by the American Joint Distribution Committee. The grindingly poor Chinese residents of Hong Kew showed benign tolerance toward the foreigners. Japan, an ally of Germany, left them alone. Japanese leaders, having bought into a miasma of anti-Semitic theories, had no wish to antagonize American Jewry.

Amidst Hong Kew's squalor, the refugees formed a vital, self-contained community, with institutions, sports clubs, newspapers, theatres, cafes and cabarets. They felt safe until the Japanese bombing of Pearl Harbour in December 1941, at which point Baghdadi Jews were declared enemies and "Joint" funds were cut off. Responsibility for the refugees then fell on the shoulders of the long-established Russian Jewish community. Conditions worsened in 1943 when stateless Jews in Hong Kew were moved into a segregated area. Food was scarce and disease was rampant. Toward the close of the war, 31 refugees were killed by a U.S. bombing raid. With Shanghai's liberation, the refugees left China.

A solid documentary, Shanghai Ghetto unfolds through the medium of interviews with former refugees and historians and of footage from the past and present. Shanghai was a footnote in the Holocaust, but what a fascinating footnote.

Less than 10 per cent of the Jewish children in Nazi-occupied Europe made it through World War II. The survivors were rescued by Christians who concealed them. Secret Lives (Thursday, May 8 at 7. 15 p.m.), an absorbing film about these children and their rescuers, is directed by Aviva Slesin, a Lithuanian survivor.

The majority of rescuers were motivated by altruistic reasons. But some were driven by a desire for profit, a need to convert their charges to Christianity and, in a few cases, a perverted impulse to abuse the children in their care. Whatever their motives, all the rescuers risked immediate execution if found sheltering Jews.

The stories are amazing. Alice Sondike was smuggled out of the Warsaw ghetto by her parents, Adam and Julia Melcer. Ed Van Thijn, a future mayor of Amsterdam, was hidden by 18 different families. Ephraim Gat was concealed by a Polish family, spending days and nights in a closet. Paul Wagner was hidden by a family near Cracow. Harold (Hans) Gottschall survived in The Hague.

Among the rescuers was Marion Pritchard, a Dutch woman who decided to act after watching the spectacle of a Jewish child flung into a truck by her pigtails.

In some instances, rescuers and rescuees developed extremely close relationships. Sondike, for example, did not wish to be reunited with her parents after the war, but she relented. "Anyway, now she loves me," says her mother. At this, Sondike flashes a sweet smile.

Sam Milnik, a Russian Jew, immigrated to California after reading Jack London's novel, The Valley of the Moon. Captivated by the gently rolling hills and temperate climate of the Sonoma Valley, Milnik settled down as a chicken farmer in Petaluma, one of its largest towns. Friends back in Russia followed him to Petaluma, known as "the world's egg basket." By the 1920s, Petaluma was the hub of a thriving colony of Jewish chicken farmers. A Home on the Range (Wednesday, May 7 at 7: 15 p.m.), by Bonnie Burt and Judith Montell, skillfully recreates this phase of Petaluma's history.

The Jewish Agricultural Society provided low-interest loans to Jews who thought they could cope with clucking chickens. "For a few thousand dollars, you could buy land and be your own boss," says the descendant of a pioneer.

Although profit margins were small and chickens were susceptible to diseases, the mainly secular Jews of Petaluma fared reasonably well. They built fine homes and a tight-knit community anchored by a synagogue. But Petaluma was hardly a paradise. There was a strong whiff of anti-Semitism in the 1930s and 1940s, and the McCarthyist era fragmented the community.

Later, crushed by conglomerates, Petaluma's small farmers were forced to look elsewhere for a livelihood. Through revealing interviews with its Jewish residents, Burt and Montell paint a vivid picture of a quaint community utterly transformed by time.

Last April, in Operation Defensive Shield, the Israeli army stormed into Jenin's Palestinian refugee camp to round up suicide bombers who had wreaked havoc in Israel. In an ambush, 13 soldiers, all reservists from the Mesaya'at company, were killed in a raid. Jenin Diary (Thursday, May 8 at 3 p.m.), by Gil Mezuman, takes the form of a stark post-mortem during which the company's shell-shocked members relive their experiences. The camera also pans on Israeli patrols moving through Jenin in mopping-up operations raids and on heavy-duty tractors cleaning up the mess.

Although Jenin Diary occasionally bogs down, there are some powerful moments. Ofer, an officer, recalls the death of two of his men. Eli, a simple soldier, says, "We were hit really bad." Idan, a commander, remembers the horror of it all. In perhaps the most wrenching testimony, Oshri, a medic, talks remorsefully about a fallen comrade who drew his last breath in his arms.

The interviewees speak thoughtfully, but one flippant soldier recalls "nailing" a Palestinian with a bullet to his head. The mental attrition the fighting exacted on ordinary soldiers is best distilled by Altschul, a reservist who confesses that he is "finished" with the army and that "nothing is worth dying for."

As Jenin Diary concludes, soldiers scrub their assault rifles with oil, as if readying them for further combat. In Israel, the battle for survival never ends.

Public loses when media keep stories under wraps

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

CNN chief news editor Eason Jordan's revelation in "The News we kept to ourselves" (New York Times, April 11) that his organization for years kept stories of Iraq's brutal regime under wraps has caused a mixture of surprise and outrage in media circles.

If a news organization cannot report freely and honestly – as it could not in Saddam's totalitarian police state – then why report at all? Isn't the public the big loser in such a farce?

In her Globe and Mail article on this topic (April 15) Margaret Wente wrote: "In its scale and sadism, the [Iraqi] regime's brutality went way beyond the cruelty of your average police state. It lasted for 20 years. Saddam's rule of terror ought to have sparked international outrage years ago. But it never did. Why not?"

Wente noted that Iraq's atrocities were well-documented and the information was available to the media. Journalists, however, dared not report them from Iraq for fear of retribution from Saddam's henchmen. Outside of Iraq few cared to publicize the horrors they knew about.

Correspondents in Iraq had to be accompanied by "minders" who directed them to the stories they were allowed to cover and monitored their words and the words of those who were "interviewed." A perennial favourite involved going to hospitals to showcase children suffering for a lack of medications, a situation attributed to U.S.-led UN sanctions.

Never seen was Iraq's prison for children or Saddam's seemingly innumerable palaces built at a cost of several billion dollars, money that should have gone to the people. Rarely discussed was the UN oil-for-food program, which, if Saddam had not interfered with it, could have addressed the needs of the Iraqi people.

But again, there was always the United States to blame.

When former CBC TV Mideast correspondent Neil Macdonald did a story from Baghdad on the10th anniversary of the 1991 Gulf War (a report in which he blamed the United States for much of the Iraqi suffering), he did draw attention to the fear in the country: "People here are so scared of their own government that they don't even utter Saddam Hussein's name."

But what of journalists themselves?

Wente reminded us that Peter Arnett, a veteran journalist and former CNN reporter from Baghdad, admitted a year ago that if you wish to report from Iraq, "you have no option other than to report the opinion of the government."

Thus nearly all the news we got from Iraq throughout the years, whether it was from Canadian journalists or others, served Saddam's interests. This gives the notion of "embedded" reporting a whole new meaning. Still, why not have prefaced each report with simple truths that would have given the report more credibility? Simple truths such as: we are accompanied by minders all the time; our copy is reviewed; we are not allowed here or there; people interviewed were not allowed to speak freely, etc. At least let the viewers know that the reporter is severely limited. Viewers can then draw their own conclusions.

Why is it that a few journalists were able to give you such simple truths and others not? Ellen Pinchuck of CTV News was one of the very few who let her Canadian audience know what limitations she faced. More about that next week.

Anti Israel Rally at York University January 2003

The Campus Then and Now

Campus life in the past may have had its stresses and strains but nothing compares to the difficult position Jewish students now find themselves in on campus. Anti-Israel anti-Semitic rhetoric is forcing Jewish students to face grave challenges.

Maissner carries chazzanut into the future

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

The best in liturgical music – from the fun to the educational to the serious – will be presented this month by Cantor Benjamin Maissner of Holy Blossom Temple when he showcases nine of his present and former students in a gala concert.

Cantor Israel Goldstein, director of the School of Sacred Music at Hebrew Union College in New York, will join Maissner at the concert titled the Future of the Modern Cantorate, on Sunday, May 11 at 7:30 p.m. at Holy Blossom Temple.

Maissner says the Levites who sang Psalms in the Temple are the forerunners of synagogue cantors.

"All through history, it was the cantor who led the people in tfillah and yearning to be closer to God," Maissner says.

"I have been privileged to teach and mentor cantorial students for some years now. These nine students are the future Levites who will carry on the sacred calling of the chazzan into the next millennium."

"I was inspired by my teacher and master, Chazzan Shlomo Ravitz of blessed memory, to become the best there is in the field of chazzanut," Maissner says.

"The love and warmth that he had for his students and for the art of cantorial music kindled the passion I possess and try to instill in my students."

For more information on the concert, or to purchase tickets, call Mari Lynn Rusak, 416-789-3291, ext. 224, or e-mail mlrusak@holyblossom.org.

Russian scientist hosts Space Day celebration

By SVETLANA BARKAN
Special to The CJN

On April 12, 1961, Soviet cosmonaut Yuri Gagarin became the first person ever to travel in space. Since then, April 12 has been celebrated by Russians as Cosmonaut Day, or Space Day.

Dr. Zelina Iskanderova is one of the many Russian Jewish scientists who have contributed time, effort and knowledge to the understanding and development of space exploration. After working for many years in the Academy of Science in the former Soviet Union, Iskanderova moved to Canada and is now an adjunct professor at University of Toronto's Institute for Aerospace Studies (UTIAS), and a head of the Space Materials Division at ITL Inc.

Iskanderova is the first woman to hold the title of adjunct professor at UTIAS. Her husband Alex Iskanderov, also a Ph.D., is the plant manager at Richter SCI, a high-tech company in Mississauga. He was formerly involved in the development of space radiation detectors.

After moving to Canada with her family 10 years ago, Iskanderova said she has always maintained a strong connection with her Jewish roots. In an effort to contribute to the development of the Russian-Jewish community in Toronto therefore, she, along with two other women, organized and hosted a Space Day celebration on April 12.

The event included a lecture presentation and kids art exhibition at the Russian Library and Information Centre, which opened recently in the Promenade Village Shoppes (see more at www.russianlibrary.ca).

The library's founder and manager, Svetlana Roufanova, says the Russian library facilitates a cultural link between generations and provides a "cross-cultural education." All Russian-language readers are welcome to use the collections of books, journals, notes, audio materials and videos. The library also contains books by Russian Jewish authors, features paintings by Israeli and Toronto artists, and offers lectures, presented by professionals, including Jewish Russian volunteers.

M & N Segal Art School, whose headmaster Nadia Segal organized an Association of Russian Artists in Canada three years ago, also contributed to Space Day. Students of the school created space-related art works and paintings, which were featured in the Russian library. During the opening ceremony, Segal and Roufanova introduced the paintings, handed diplomas to all participants, and presented awards for some of the artwork.

Iskanderova gave a lecture about the past, present and future of space exploration, weaving together her personal experiences with well-known facts about the history of space exploration.

She began her talk with a story about Konstantin Tsiolkovsky, a poor, almost deaf boy from the small town of Kaluga near Moscow who became a school teacher and scientist. Tsiolkovsky is now considered a grandfather of modern space exploration, Iskanderova said, because he developed a jet propulsion formula used in experiments, wrote books and envisioned the day a man would soar above the earth.

Alex Iskanderova's grandmother, a Jewish woman also from Kaluga, told the audience that Tsiolkovsky was her substitute teacher throughout her school years. She said Jews in old Russia were not allowed to leave capital cities.

Many firsts were highlighted in the presentation – the first Russian space satellite called the Sputnik, the first manned space flight, the first women in space, the first joint Russian-American space flight, the first journey to the moon, the first space station and the first International Space Station (ISS) now being developed.

In her talk, Iskanderova said that on Aug. 10, 2001, she took her granddaughter Sheindl to the Kennedy Space Center where Iskanderova was an invited guest at a NASA space shuttle launch. Her space materials samples, together with others, were being sent into space on this mission for an experiment at ISS.

Iskanderova also paid tribute to the people who have sacrificed their lives in space exploration, including the crew of space shuttle Columbia. She noted that the first Israeli astronaut Ilan Ramon's tragic death touched the hearts of many around the world.

Stress is more fattening than chocolate

By FRAN BRIGETTE
Positive Changes Today

Chronic stress releases a powerful hormone that signals the body to relax and refuel. This important hormone, called Cortisol, is the body's way of slowing us down so that we don't burn out. The downside is that Cortisol's message to slow down usually makes us feel tired, sluggish and hungry. Therefore, while under the powerful influence of Cortisol, our tendency is to want to lie around, watch TV and snack.

Additionally, Cortisol triggers fat storage in the adipose tissue of the abdomen. When the majority of weight is in the abdomen it gives one an apple appearance. More importantly, it can lead to Cushing's syndrome, which involves storage of fat on the inside of the abdominal cavity. Cushing's syndrome can be dangerous and may lead to diabetes and heart disease.

Positive Changes clients learn self-hypnosis techniques so that tension will not build up and cause weight gain

Dieting Ranks 7th Amongst Top 10 Stressors!

Dieting forces you to think and behave in a way that is completely contrary to what you've been trained since childhood to do. This is why dieters always fall into the mantra, "I was doing really well until… (an unusually stressful event)."

Therefore, if one eats out of stress, and then forces oneself into the seventh most stressful human event (dieting), the yo-yo syndrome is not far behind. If you've failed at dieting more than once you've created a pattern for failure and will likely continue to fail until something in your mental strategy changes.

If you've tried diets, pills, surgery or exercise more than twice and you're still overweight, your body is not the problem, it's your mind.

Hypnosis helps to change the way you think, act and respond to your environment. At Positive Changes, the behaviours of a naturally thin person are mainlined into the subconscious. "The natural side-effect of hypnosis is relief from stress, which makes it the logical choice for permanent weight loss," says Dr. Patrick Porter, Executive Director of Positive Changes.

Yom Hazikaron

This year, on Yom Hazikaron, the 4th of Iyar, it is appropriate that we recall the life of Ilan Ramon. Dina Prager of Toronto sent The CJN the accompanying poem.

נפל ממרומים ולעד נעלם.
נגדע איל באש שמים,
נפל בסערה והדמעות וזלגות על לחיים.

היית גאוותינו, תקוותינו, אור לגויים,
לוחם אמיץ, איש רוח בן - האלוקים.

כה סמלי הוא שאת נשמתך לקחה הרוח,
שנים ארב לך בשתר מלאך המוות,

לא יכול היה להכניעך באטמוספרה,
על כן בחר בחלל במלכדת לוהטת וארורה.
זכות לכבוד השמורה רק למעטים,

מעתה תהלך בחברת האל ותרוחף עם המלאכים,
היית לאביר השמיים וכנפיך כנפי האלוקים.
גדול היית בחייך וענק במותך,
תחסר לנו חבר בנוכחותך ואישיותך.

אילן היקר מלאך שומר הרוח,
שמור עלינו מלמעלה והובילנו אל עתיד יותר בטוח.

(The poem has been slightly altered to protect religious sensibilities. The editor)

Navigating Mideast discussions

By DARCIE RICHLER

Typically, a debate on the Middle East will begin with a single assertion that lays sole responsibility for the current conflict at Israel's doorstep.

This is a reflection of a deliberate and sustained (not to mention effective) public relations strategy that has sought to distract the outside world into believing that a complex problem such as this one can be reduced to a simple formula that places the onus on Israel to resolve the conflict.

Imagine that you're golfing with some acquaintances and engaging in a discussion of current events, more specifically the Israeli-Palestinian conflict and terrorism, when one of your fellow golfers says: "While I don't claim to be an expert on the Middle East, it seems rather obvious that the crux of the problem there is the whole settlement issue. If the Israelis would just stop expanding onto land that does not belong to them, the terrorism would end."

Assuming that you know that terrorism has long pre-dated settlements, (see http://www.cicweb.ca/conflict/terrorism.shtml) and that in the case of peace negotiations, successive Israeli governments have always indicated a willingness to have settlements considered among the "final status" issues (although in 2000, when Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat rejected peace and chose terrorism, settlements were certainly not the obstacle to the Camp David peace talks), how would you answer?

Instead of debating the settlement issue, try something like this: "There is no cause-and-effect relationship between the settlements and terrorism. The real problem in the Middle East is the Arab world's refusal to acknowledge the existence or legitimacy of a Jewish state in the region. How can we even get into a debate about settlements when one of the parties refuses to acknowledge the other's legitimacy as a permanent nation within the region?"

When it comes to pro-Israel advocacy, we believe it is very important to clear up any misunderstandings on the topic of the Middle East. The simplistic arguments and comments that are neatly packaged by anti-Israel forces are especially attractive to Canadians who know little or nothing about the historical context of the current situation. As noted in our last column, the aim is to promote Israel by keeping control of the agenda.

Sadly, it is a well-known fact that Palestinian children are being indoctrinated on a daily basis to hate Israel and Jews. This is true whether they are exposed to the Islamic school system operated by Hamas or the PA system – and by extension, the UNRWA-operated schools in the refugee camps. In geography classes, Palestinian children are shown maps that don't include Israel. They also read textbooks that laud suicide bombing and eulogize the bombers as "martyrs" who have brought the dream of Israel's destruction closer to reality. If this were not enough, Palestinian television airs commercials that encourage children to die in the name of Allah.

Draw on these points when engaged in a debate that seeks to identify the crux of the Arab-Israeli conflict. Our task is to remind people that the conflict is all about the acceptance of a Jewish state in the region, and that throughout the Arab world, every effort continues to be exerted to demonize and de-legitimize that state.

As a side note on settlements, it should be said that Israel has been willing to give up land for peace. This was demonstrated in the peace deals Israel signed with both Egypt and Jordan. In the case of Egypt, the Israeli government was even fearful that a civil war might be sparked by settlers in the Sinai, yet the Israelis still chose land for peace.

Arguments can be backed up with facts such as these. While any debate or discussion about the Middle East can be challenging, keep this as your core or fundamental principle. To be sure, some issues are complicated. But we encourage you to learn more about them so you can broaden the scope of your advocacy skills.

Jewish Life

Midrashic Moments

Yom Ha'atzmaut is approaching and it's been a difficult year for Israel. Issues of safety and security have always been a part of life for the Jewish state. In fact, they have always been a part of life for Jewish communities everywhere. This past year, however, many Jews living outside Israel have found themselves in difficult situations.

This year, we witnessed the tide of popular opinion raise questions about Israel's very existence. In the best of times, political discussions with friends can be awkward. In these times, and seemingly overnight, even language that is part of an internal culture has come under political attack. Some people are uncomfortable using the word "Zionism," while others are nervous about phrases such as "peace in the Middle East," as they understand they could open the door to discussing Israel's legitimacy as a sovereign state.

While Jewish culture and religion has very strong prohibitions against gossiping, or negative speech about an individual, we were unprepared for the same negative speech aimed at Israel.

If a dear friend were verbally attacked, most of us would stand to defend them. If we are silent and listen to the attack repeated over time, eventually we may question whether there is truth to the accusations and it will inevitably affect the friendship. This is the danger of negative speech.

The Talmud asks who is most injured by gossip. Of the three individuals involved – the one speaking, the one listening and the one being spoken of – who is most harmed? According to the rabbis, the one listening is the most injured, because it is their world that will change the most. This year, Jews around the world outside of Israel have been listening, and we have been injured.

When it comes to gossip, the goal is to make it stop. At times, this can be accomplished by walking away, since often when there is no audience, there is no speaker. However, when it comes to Israel, there is always an audience. Therefore, walking away will not accomplish the goal. Just as we would defend a friend, so must we defend Israel as she is verbally attacked.

Of course, the concerns of negative speech do not negate the Jewish necessity to evaluate situations and always pursue justice. But the verbal attacks on Israel do not result in a true evaluation of, and a just solution to, Mideast conflict, since there is no safe space within which to conduct that important reflection. Our Jewish goals are sidetracked by gossip.

It has been a hard year for Israel and for all those who love Israel. On Yom Ha'atzmaut, we must attend public celebrations and openly display our support for Israel. The Talmud tells us that silence is an admission of guilt. The verbal attacks on Israel have been public and widespread. So must be our response.

This year the celebration is for us, to stand with thousands of people that we know feel as we do.

Given the year it has been, what a relief it will be.

Yom Hashoah: Righteous Gentiles, part 2

The Jewish Highway

Knud Dyby. Irene Opdyke. Varian Fry. Their names are not as familiar as those of Oskar Schindler or Raoul Wallenberg, but Knud Dyby [http://www.rongreene.com/dyby.html], Irene Opdyke [http://www.holocaustcenter.org/oralh/opdykeirene.htm] and Varian Fry [http://www.almondseed.com/vfry/] are also heroes who risked their lives to save Jews from Nazi oppression.

Today, we honour the memory of Righteous Gentiles and look at the stories of diplomats who defied their own governments in order to save Jews. Then we'll ask the difficult question: why did some people choose to risk their lives to do good while so much evil surrounded them?

During World War II, Aristides de Sousa Mendes was the Portuguese consul general to Bordeaux, France and a devout Catholic. In 1940, French Jews and Jewish refugees from all parts of Europe fled to France where they found themselves trapped. Against the orders of his government, de Sousa Mendes issued thousands of visas to allow them passage into Portugal. For his efforts, Aristides de Sousa Mendes was fired from the Portuguese foreign service. He died in neglect and poverty-stricken in 1954. [http://www.us-israel.org/jsource/biography/Mendes.html]

Ironically, these heroes were often punished for their efforts by their own governments. In 1940, Chiune Sugihara was a Japanese consul posted in Lithuania. He ignored instructions from Tokyo and distributed thousands of visas to desperate Jews. [http://www.remember.org/imagine/sugihara.html] Sugihara was punished for his actions and returned to Japan in disgrace. JewishGen: The Home of Jewish Genealogy has established the Sugihara Database and has documented over 2,000 people rescued. [http://www.jewishgen.org/databases/sugihara.htm]

Working in Nazi-occupied Hungary, Swedish diplomat Per Anger issued provisional passports and was also able to rescue thousands of Jews. As noted in a fascinating article on the Guardian Web site, Anger's heroism continued after the war. After the Hungarian uprising of 1956, Anger, who was then based in Vienna, helped thousands of people flee Budapest. Per Anger died last August. [http://www.guardian.co.uk/obituaries/story/0,3604,782085,00.html]

Sugihara, de Sousa Mendes and Anger are not alone in their heroism. To date, Yad Vashem has recognized 18 diplomats as Righteous Among the Nations. Their heroism has also been been honoured in an exhibit by the Center for Holocaust Studies at the University of Minnesota. [http://makeashorterlink.com/?M2B631824]

There are (thankfully) far too many Righteous Gentiles to be acknowledged in an article such as this. For more biographies, I recommend the following sites: the Simon Wiesenthal Center Museum of Tolerance [http://motlc.wiesenthal.com/pages/rn.html] the Jewish Virtual Library [http://www.usisrael.org/jsource/Holocaust/rescuetoc.html] and A Teacher's Guide to the Holocaust-Rescuers and Resisters. [http://fcit.coedu.usf.edu/holocaust/people/rescuer.html]

But why did they do it? What motivates someone to risk his or her own life while others stand in silence?

According to Eva Fogelman, "From the earliest ages, rescuers were taught by their parents that people are inextricably linked to one another. No one person or group was better than any other." Fogelman is the daughter of a Holocaust survivor and founder of the Jewish Foundation for Christian Rescuers.

Nechama Tec is a professor of sociology and a survivor of the Shoah. She found that the rescuers were "individualists" who pursued personal values. Most were extremely modest people who had a long-term commitment to aid the needy. They didn't look at Jews as dehumanized symbols but as people in need. [http://www.tulane.edu/~so-inst/slguid7.html]

Perhaps Miep Gies, the woman who sheltered Anne Frank, explained the actions of Righteous Gentiles best. [http://teacher.scholastic.com/frank/saving.htm] "Jan [my husband] and I had no choice. We did foresee many sleepless nights and a miserable life if we would refuse to help, and that was not the kind of future we were looking forward to. Remorse can be worse than losing your life." [http://www.umich.edu/~urecord/9495/Oct17_94/4.htm].

'To me, I was in prison'

Occasionally, her mother would come visit her to give her strength. "I was begging my mother to take me with her. She said, 'no, it is so dangerous.'

"To me, I was in prison."

A day in December 1943 proved a brief respite for the anguished teen. "Genia took me to her apartment where my aunt and mother were. I sat with my head on her knees. I was very happy."

Back in her hiding place soon after, she was visited by her father for a few days. She recalls him reading poetry to her to pass the time.

On Feb. 1, 1944 her mother visited for the last time. She brought Bianka some chocolate and a warm coat. Later that day, her parents were betrayed by the nephew of one of the Zagota members and both her parents as well as the person hiding them were killed. It was her mother's 46th birthday.

Kraszewski remained in the tiny room until the Polish uprising in August 1944. During the fighting, the building she was in was struck by a bomb and it collapsed around her. She was knocked unconscious and when she came to, all her outer clothes had been blown away.

She decided to flee to Genia, who was hiding her nephew Gabriel, but circumstances prevented her from joining Genia when she took Gabriel to the countryside. Instead she joined other families leaving Warsaw, and managed to survive the war working on farms.

She reunited with Gabriel after the war and the two moved to Scotland to be with an uncle. There she met her husband, Ludwik, who had been a Polish soldier fighting the Nazis. In 1951 they moved to Canada and now reside in Oakville, Ont.

Karola Karo, 82, was born in Warsaw and grew up at Ogrodova 7 in an apartment that would later come within the borders of the Warsaw Ghetto.

Prior to the war, Karo recalls a happy childhood with a big family, a good education, lots to eat and summers spent at cottages in Ostrovsk and Shrudborov.

Karo's father, Simon, ran a successful textile store. "The happy memories were that we had a beautiful home, and a lot of relatives used to come to us from the provinces. They ate at our place and they stayed at our place. We had a big family outside Warsaw."

In September 1939, the German bombing of Warsaw commenced and early on, Karo's mother, Chava, and oldest brother Max, were killed. The store was destroyed in the bombing early on and later their apartment was destroyed. The family moved in with Karo's sister, who had an apartment in the ghetto.

Early in the occupation, a friend convinced her to leave German-occupied Poland and make their way to Russian territory.

Karo already had some experience with German soldiers. "The German soldiers beat up Jews, they cut their beards and gave them here and here," gesturing at her face with mock slaps.

Joining her friend, Karo set out for the border area (Germany had occupied western Poland, the Soviets the eastern half).

Close to the border, they ran into a German patrol who shouted "Halt." Made to lie on the ground, Karo could hear her friend reciting the Shema, a prayer in anticipation of death.

Instead, the soldiers stripped them of all valuables, taking rings, jewelry, money, documents, even photographs. Still alive, they continued their journey and through a series of adventures, crossed to the Russian side.

There she was interned for a year for entering the country illegally and afterwards, when an amnesty was granted, they were sent east, ending up in Samarkand and Tashkent. There she worked operating sewing machines.

After the war she heard "no-one was alive. I didn't have the heart to go back."

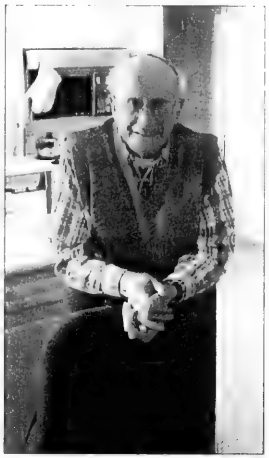
David Herman was born in Warsaw 84 years ago. He grew up in a home practically in the shadows of the Nozik Street shul, one of the biggest in Warsaw.



David Herman

The seventh of nine children, Herman grew up in a comfortable home. His father, Abraham, was a butcher and as a consequence, "food was never short."

As a youngster, Herman studied at a yeshiva, though he would have preferred a school with more exposure to secular studies.

His first job was as a hardware salesman and later he went into his own business, manufacturing sock garters. "I made good money," he recalled.

With the war, "life changed right away." Herman and his family went into hiding, attempting to avoid Germans conscripting people for forced labour. "They called people to work and some didn't come back," he said.

Shortly after the ghetto was created in late 1939, Herman escaped to the Russian zone. After earning some money, he returned to try to get his family out but his father convinced them to give up the escape attempt.

"He remembered the Germans from 1914 and he said we could live with them."

Once the deportations began, he paid more bribes to get his parents out of the ghetto to the town of Cmielow. But not long afterwards, in 1942, the town's Jews were deported to death camps. Among them were his parents and sister Chava.

Herman went to work mining iron ore for a Polish company, living in a barracks and being fed regularly.

In January 1943, Herman was deported to a labour camp at Pionki and eventually was sent to Auschwitz and Mauthausen. When he was liberated in 1945, he weighed 79 pounds. "Another week, and I wouldn't be alive," he said.

Two of his sisters survived the war. He had an emotional reunion with one at a displaced persons camp in Landsberg, Germany after the war. In 1948, Herman and his wife, who he met in Germany, emigrated to Canada.

Rebeka Bialystok was already working as a bookkeeper when the war broke out.

Life for her family had been difficult. The depression had hit her father Szaya's shirt factory hard. She also recalls a climate of anti-Semitism in Poland that was made worse after Hitler came to power in Germany.

Quotas – the infamous numerus clausus – were placed on Jews, restricting their numbers in higher education while those who were allowed to attend university were forced to stand at the back of the class.

Bialystok, 89, recalls that Jews enjoyed a rich cultural life, with their own Yiddish and Polish-language papers, Haynt (Today) and Moment.

"They were part of the impoverished bourgeoisie, thoroughly Polanized," said her son, Frank Bialystok, a historian of the Holocaust and of Polish Jewry. "She considered herself a Polish citizen of the Mosaic faith."

Dialogue group takes steps toward peace

By ABIGAIL CUKIER
Special to The CJN

HAMILTON — They sit around the table talking excitedly about pizza and university applications and making inside jokes. Their loud laughter and kind-hearted teasing resembles that of any other gathering of young adults, but this group has been seen by many in the community as almost historic.

They are part of the Jewish-Muslim Dialogue Group, which is made up of about a dozen high school and university students from the Hamilton area who began sharing ideas, beliefs and stories in February at twice-a-week meetings at a Burlington mosque and a Hamilton synagogue.

Participants say they joined out of a desire for peace in the Middle East and in their own communities. Many had witnessed violence against, or harassment of, Jews and Muslims.

"I wanted to see that it was possible for Jews and Muslims to be friends, to sit around a table together, not just sit across a negotiation table, but to form relationships," said Rebecca Starkman, 17.

Sara Cuneo, 18, said she is concerned about the peace process and the relationship between Jews and Muslims.

"I thought the first step toward peace was meeting them myself and seeing they're really people," she said.

When they joined, most of their family members and friends told them the group was pointless and that they were wasting their time. But now, the group has enjoyed local news coverage, invitations to interfaith meetings, letters and comments from classmates and teachers. They are being held up as an example of what community members can do to bring about change.

"It makes me more optimistic about what can happen locally and it will hopefully spark other things in the community," said Hashem Ali, 20.

Another group is already in the works at McMaster University and students at York University have approached the young adults for advice on how to form their own circle.

The Jewish-Muslim Dialogue Group was formed by Rabbi Irwin Zeplowitz of Hamilton's Temple Anshe Sholom and Muslim scholar Dr. Yahya Fadlalla, a preacher at Halton Mosque in Burlington, who saw the need for interfaith dialogue after the Sept. 11 attacks.

Rabbi Zeplowitz said after he announced the idea at High Holy Day services, congregants approached him and asked to participate.

"It is important to begin to see the other side, to see the essential humanness of the 'other,' how much Jews and Muslims have in common, even while pointing out the differences," the rabbi said. "We are not going to change the world in this generation or even the next, or the next. But we are in this for the long-term. If you keep sharing, it is possible for the good ideas to grow in people's hearts."

Rabbi Zeplowitz and Fadlalla started the group's early sessions with icebreakers and formal topics, but it soon became clear that neither was necessary. The participants were eager to discuss everything from religious holidays and the life cycle to food and dating.

Lauren Mark, 17, said it was good to learn about the many parallels between the two cultures, including kosher versus halal meat and similarities in the Hebrew and Arabic alphabets. Values such as the importance of helping fellow human beings are also shared.

Starkman said she had never before interacted with a Muslim person.

"We live in Canada, this huge mosaic. But people end up staying within their own community, either on purpose or by default," Starkman said. "People should step outside and seek out the other. Don't just look and smile. Do something."

Although the group's formal meetings ended after three weeks, the participants still talk on the phone and meet regularly for coffee. They consider each other friends.

Though they never formally discussed the situation in Israel, they now feel they are ready.

"It was important that we did not talk about it too early. We wanted to form relationships first," said Deenah Qubaia, 21. "You're going to talk to a friend differently than you would to just a stranger. You will pay more attention to how a friend is feeling as opposed to a stranger."

Naomi Klinghoffer, 17, agreed, saying if the group had discussed politics when they first met, she would have remembered the Muslim participants by what they said, not by their names.

"Now that we are friends, it would just be a conversation," she said.

The group is planning to invite more members to join or to hold an open meeting. Ali said many of his friends are interested and other participants said they want other young people to be inspired and begin their own dialogues.

"We hope this leads to larger things. Already something wonderful has been accomplished," said Starkman, who intends to start a similar initiative when she begins university.

Participation in the group has not only changed the way the young adults feel about members of their own community, but it has also affected how they view the conflict in the Middle East. They said they now realize how important the land is to the other side and they agree that compromise begins when you can see the other point of view.

"I don't even see it as the other side," said Ali. "We all want the same thing. We all want people to stop dying."

Husband had already left for Israel

"Life was hard for them because of a bankruptcy and the depression," but the family had a four or five room apartment and they employed a Polish maid who slept next to the stove, he said.

Rebeka recalls that her business was destroyed in the bombardment early in the war and she decided to flee shortly afterward.

"My parents wanted me to leave. They said maybe they would try to come later. I was very much against it, but they persuaded me to leave."

Her husband Shimon, whom she'd married one month before the war began, had already left with her younger brother Israel, to avoid Nazi roundups of young, military-age Poles.

On Nov. 11, 1939 she left the city for the Russian-occupied zone. Approaching the Vistula River, which marked the boundary between the two sides, she saw Germans confiscating people's valuables. Luckily, she was allowed to pass.

Once in the Soviet Union, Bialystok reunited with her husband in Rovno and later they were deported to Archangel in the far north and later to Uzbekistan, where they spent close to six years.

Bialystok was far away when the ghetto uprising took place, but many of her childhood friends from Hashomer Hatzair took place in the uprising. None survived.

One of her brother's good friends from Hashomer Hatzair was Mordechai Anielewicz, who went on to lead the uprising, Frank said. They were the same age, born in 1919 and "Anielewicz came from a very poor family. His mother sold fish in the market."

Today the uprising has become an important part of the Polish historical memory.

"The citizens of Warsaw have appropriated the memory of the uprising as a model for their uprising a year later," Frank said, adding it is recognized as a Jewish revolt.

Though she doesn't know specifically how they died, Rebeka's parents and many in her family were killed.

"Today it's hard for people to understand how people managed to survive, how people ran away and how people were killed," she said. "It was only a matter of luck."

Couples renew vows as shul marks 150 years

By PHYLLIS SHRAGGE
Hamilton Correspondent

HAMILTON — A sense of satisfaction with the past and optimism for the future permeated the sanctuary of Temple Anshe Sholom recently during a renewal of wedding vows service that involved 12 couples determined to reaffirm their lifelong commitment to one another.

The April 6 service, just one of a number of events held this year to mark the 150th anniversary of Temple Anshe Sholom, provided the couples, who all had been married at the temple, the unique opportunity to experience a second wedding with the same spouse.

There was a hush in the sanctuary as the beaming couples gathered under the two chupot on the bimah.

Rabbi Irwin Zeplowitz, spiritual leader of Temple Anshe Sholom, and Rabbi Bernard Baskin, its rabbi emeritus, conducted the service, with Cantor Emeritus Ruth Slater singing the hymns.

"Some who share this bimah have been together for 60 years, others were married only a few weeks ago," Rabbi Zeplowitz said.

"We join in common celebration of their commitment to one another and their connection to Temple Anshe Sholom. As our congregation celebrates 150 years of existence as Canada's oldest Reform congregation, we recognize that the essence of our strength has always been the steadfastness of its members."

The congregation has flourished both because of the loyalty of the members, even those who move away, and because of the highest ideals of Judaism, Rabbi Zeplowitz said.

"These couples… embody many of those ideals: faith and loyalty, love, reliability and generosity.

Rabbi Zeplowitz said he hesitated to give marital advice to the couples, whose years of marriage totaled more than 300 years.

"It is easy perhaps not to give advice, but to give thanks to God for being lucky enough to be witness to such an amazing assembly of dedication of concerned love and commitment."

In congratulating the couples, Rabbi Baskin said perhaps he should include himself and his wife Marjorie, who will be celebrating their 55th wedding anniversary this year.

"I know that the secret of a happy marriage is simple. Just keep being polite to each other as you are to your best friends. Evidently you've learned that lesson," Rabbi Baskin said.

He stressed that the renewal of vows is important because the concept of marriage is in danger, and "your experience insists that marriage is still the best way to enshrine love, raise children and overcome loneliness."

As the service ended with the breaking of the glass, Rabbi Baskin said the tradition has special significance during a renewal of the vows service.

"It means turning your backs on all the imperfections, all the problems, all the difficulties and all the sorrows of yesterday as you look forward hopefully to all the fruitful days that lie ahead."

Among those participating in the renewal ceremony were noted sculptor Anne Mirvish and her husband Ed Mirvish, the renowned Toronto retail magnate and theatre impresario. The Mirvishs were married at Temple Anshe Sholom in 1941.

Among the guests at the renewal of the vows service was former Ontario lieutenant governor Lincoln Alexander, who is a good friend of the Mirvishs.

Robert and Suzanne Passow were married at the temple in 2000. The service provided "a chance for a new beginning," Suzanne said.

There were problems with Robert's conversion to Judaism prior to the first wedding, she said. At the renewal of the vows ceremony, they had the complete support of their families, and their two-year old daughter also attended.

"We had so many initial struggles. We've been through so much as a couple. We are a lot stronger."

The other couples who renewed their vows were: Arnold and Marsha Sandler (married in 1962); Mel and Fran Petersiel (1963); Lawrence and Marla Kobetz (1970); Marvin and Lorraine Cohen (1976); Gerald and Cindy Vertlieb (1977); Steven and Cheryl Dembe (1982); Norman and Marla Weddum (1983); Irwin Rodin and Judy Mendelson (1988); Perry Sussman and Ramona Solomon Sussman (1994); and Garry Barankin and Amanda Hall (2003).

Negev Dinner to honour minister

By MYRON LOVE
Prairie Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Rev. John Howson, 62, national director of Bridges for Peace, has been chosen this June's Jewish National Fund Winnipeg Negev Gala honoree.

Bridges for Peace is a Jerusalem-based, Christian organization that supports Israel, and works to build relationships between Christians and Jews worldwide.

The organization's mission includes educating Christians to identify with Israel and the Jewish people; to help Israel on a practical level; to fight anti-Semitism worldwide; and to communicate Christian perspectives to Israeli leaders and the Jewish community at large.

Originally from Windsor, Ont., Rev. Howson says he first felt the call to preach when he was 13.

Over a 26-year career as a Pentecostal pastor, he served six churches in three provinces.

In 1984, he left his church in Winnipeg to take up a new position as a councillor at 100 Huntley Street, the Christian television show, but in 1994, he lost his job due to budget cuts.

"It was the first time I had been out of work. Money was tight. My wife Ruth and I prayed for direction. We felt the call to go to Israel to volunteer for Bridges for Peace.

"We had been receiving its literature and had adopted an Israeli family," he said.

"After three months in Israel, we were hooked. Israel became my cause, and I was appointed Bridges For Peace's assistant director for Canada."

He has been the voluntary full-time director – he raises his own funds – since 1997.

As director, he travels Canada from coast to coast speaking to church groups – there are 1,200 Pentecostal congregations across Canada – explaining the Israeli and Jewish perspective.

He says there is a groundswell of support for Israel among Evangelical Christians.

He has also tried to show solidarity with the Jewish community by attending and participating in Holocaust Memorial services and Israel rallies, and contributing to the fund to restore a Winnipeg Jewish cemetery after it was vandalized two summers ago.

"It hasn't been easy. The Jewish community was slow to accept our efforts and even in my community there has been misunderstanding."

It was the current fighting in the Middle East that seems to have opened his doors to the Jewish community, he says.

He has spoken at rallies for Israel and received a plaque from the Israeli government for promoting tourism.

For the Holocaust Memorial Week this spring, he has arranged with the organizing committee to bring in a Christian speaker from Minneapolis.

"The Old Testament clearly demonstrates that God has made and kept promises to Israel," he says.

"We see the covenants being fulfilled right before our eyes. Our experiences in Israel totally changed our lives and made us realize that we want to invest our lives with the Jewish people.

"Working with the Jewish community is the most fulfilling thing I have ever done.

"It took a long time for the Jewish community to accept me. I never expected this honour."

Observant panel debates 'TV or not TV?'

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

Television exposes children to violence and immorality that can't fail to influence their behaviour.

Like everything else in the world, there is good and bad in television, and we have to approach it with common sense and intelligence.

These two opposing attitudes summed up the views of the panellists at a recent Nishma program titled "TV or not TV," which considered whether it is permissible for observant Jews to allow their children to watch television. It was the last sesssion of the year in Nishma's Religiously Incorrect series of discussions about topical issues from a Torah point of view.

Taking part were Rabbi Ephraim Applebaum, a teacher at Eitz Chaim Day Schools and founder of Parents Concerned with Media Influence; Shayna Kravetz, a lawyer, journalist and teacher; lawyer Yossi Adler; and Michael Kigel, a producer of videos on Jewish themes and star of the Vision television programs Passages and Messages. Rabbi Benjamin Hecht, founder and director of Nishma, moderated the panel.

Rabbi Applebaum called television "a magnificent machine that brings the world to our living room." However, what matters is who controls it. "It is like a knife that is benign if controlled by a housewife or a butcher, but not if it is in the hands of a murderer," he said.

"When I grew up, television programs had positive social messages. Look at I Love Lucy, Ed Sullivan, Jackie Gleason. Even the westerns had positive endings. Now, however, commercialism is everything – the more gory the program, the more money it makes."

Children, he said, are the most susceptible to the influence of television.

Kravetz insisted that "we all own TV. You choose what you watch. You are the consumer, and you can change things." By writing to advertisers and television producers and saying they are polluting the airwaves and so "I won't buy your soap," you can make a difference, she said.

Rabbi Applebaum said people could make a difference if everyone wrote letters to producers and advertisers, but he feared that would not happen. "In the meantime, the kids are being fed garbage."

Kigel said television, by its very nature, "creates a passive attitude" in those watching it, something that is questionable for Judaism, which encourages questioning and active learning. It makes him uncomfortable, he said, to go past houses at night and see only the blue lights of the television. "It makes me think of avodah zarah [idol worship]."

Kravetz agreed that TV encourages passivity, but said that is inherent in all modern inventions, including the telephone. And, she asked, "if you see a problem, do you walk away, or do something about it?"

Rabbi Hecht complained that the 22-minute sitcom offers quick and easy answers to difficult issues. "That leads the viewer to expect immediate answers and immediate gratification."

Adler said research shows no correlation between violence on television and violent acts by children. "That's not saying that aggressive kids won't go for aggressive shows, but it means that non-violent kids won't become violent."

In his own home, Adler said, he and his wife determine what shows their children can watch, and they watch with them and discuss the content. Better they should talk about issues that worry them with their parents than with their friends, he said.

Rabbi Applebaum responded that many parents are simply too busy to watch with their children. And even if they can, if something objectionable comes on, "you can't turn the set off fast enough."

Also, he said, adults become desensitized to the many acts of war, violence and immorality depicted on TV. "If adults become desensitized, how much more so do kids?"

In that case, said Rabbi Hecht, maybe adults shouldn't have a TV either, even if they don't have children.

One of the worst things about television, Rabbi Applebaum continued, is that it encourages immorality. "As religious Jews, we are told that we shouldn't go after the attractions of the eyes – that we shouldn't permit any amount of immorality. Would we accept that something is 98 per cent kosher?"

Adler countered that such a claim can be made about nearly any modern invention, noting that even telephones can be used for immoral purposes. "What people become desensitized to is fictional violence, not the real thing."

Kravetz said the campaign against television among some observant Jews is about closing off the community from the world. "More and more of the world is seen as being treif."

While she agreed that much of it is, she questioned what would happen when kids who are so protected grow up and have to face reality.

The world then becomes forbidden fruit and thus more desirable and "enticing," Adler said.

Rabbi Applebaum said the question of whether to have a television should be referred to a rabbi, who can advise each family to do what is right for them.

In response to an audience member who charged that not only are some rabbis out of touch with the world, some "are often afraid to give an answer for fear of what other rabbis will say about them," Rabbi Applebaum replied that if someone doesn't have faith in his rabbi, he should find one he does have faith in.

MOSES is more than just a cute acronym

On Campus

MONTREAL – M.O.S.E.S: not a just a cute acronym:

In August 2002, Hillel Montreal launched Project MOSES (Masses of Students Expressing Support) – an ambitious initiative that has commissioned a sefer Torah to be donated to the Hebrew University in honour of the victims of the July 2002 terrorist attack.

Like the rest of the Jewish world, Jewish students have been shocked and pained by the ongoing terrorist attacks that have targeted innocent civilians in Israel.

Memorial services, vigils and rallies have been organized throughout North American campuses to deplore these attacks and pay tribute to the victims. Jewish students, many of whom have spent quality time in Israel, have walked along Jaffa Road in Jerusalem, had a slice of pizza at Sbarro's, danced at the Dolphinarium in Tel Aviv and waited for the bus in Haifa. These are not obscure far away places.

Many of our students have also spent the year at the Hebrew University, eating and hanging out at the Frank Sinatra Cafeteria. That attack shattered many illusions. Hebrew U has always been and continues to be an oasis of co-existence in a city that at times seems on the brink.

Following the attack, a group of students got together to find a tangible way of memorializing the victims. Secular and religious were killed at Hebrew U., religious and secular got together to memorialize them.

After hours of brainstorming it came out – a sefer Torah. It is a symbol of Judaism, Jewish history, teachings and continuity. As the initial planning committee thought about it the more excited they became. The answer to Islamic fundamentalism (Islamic Jihad had claimed responsibility for the attack) would be Judaism's contribution to the world, an ethical message that values human life and the power of the human spirit.

Jewish students from different backgrounds could agree that Torah teachings were basic and fundamental, a unifying force within Judaism.

The funds for the sefer Torah would be raised by students across North America and the siyum (completion) ceremony would be held on Mount Scopus accompanied by a delegation of Jewish students.

It was also decided that all residual funds would be donated to the Mishapacha Ehad Fund, an organization that provides much needed support to the families of victims of terror.

MOSES: Masses of Students Expressing Support, must become a household word, not just a cute acronym. MOSES is a wonderful opportunity for young and old, not only to support a student project, but to send a clear message that the Jewish spirit will not be extinguished by terrorism.

To more information about MOSES (or to make a contribution) call Hillel Montreal at 514-845-9171

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Yasser Arafat's Fatah movement decided Monday to back the new cabinet proposed by incoming Palestinian Authority Prime Minister Mahmoud Abbas – also known as Abu Mazen – boosting chances the team of ministers will win approval in a parliamentary vote this week.

A "yes" vote would pave the way for the presentation of an internationally sponsored Mideast peace plan by the United States. The so-called road map envisions full Palestinian statehood within three years. U.S. President George W. Bush has linked the presentation of the plan to Abbas being installed as PA prime minister.

The forming of the new cabinet was preceded by five weeks of wrangling between Abbas and PA President Yasser Arafat, who has been reluctant to share power. Last week, after intense international pressure, Arafat withdrew some of his challenges to Abbas' cabinet, but he continues to wield considerable influence because of his control over Fatah, which commands a solid majority in parliament.

On Monday, Fatah's ruling body, the Central Committee, decided to instruct Fatah legislators to support the cabinet, said Nabil Sha'ath, the incoming foreign minister and a senior member of the movement.

"President Arafat and the Central Committee of Fatah will provide the new cabinet with all the Fatah support and personal support to win the vote of confidence [scheduled for Tuesday]," Sha'ath said.

However, it was not clear whether all Fatah legislators would heed the instructions. The lawmakers were to meet later Monday with Arafat and Abbas.

Fatah and its supporters control 62 seats in the 85-member parliament. The legislature, elected in 1996, initially had 88 members, but two have died and one has resigned. To confirm his cabinet, Abbas needs a majority of 43 legislators.

One lawmaker, speaking on condition of anonymity, said he has informally polled most of his colleagues and found that at least 47 would vote in favour of the cabinet.

On Sunday, Abbas handed his final list of ministers to Arafat's office, showing a number of changes from the original proposals. Missing from the list was Gen. Nasser Yusuf, who had been designated chief of police in the West Bank and Gaza. But new to the list was Maher al Masri, a Nablus man who will head a Ministry for National Economy.

There has been widespread criticism regarding Abbas's proposed team, with some legislators complaining he has appointed several politicians tainted by corruption and that he has failed to live up to expectations of a sweeping overhaul.

Abbas told European diplomats he met with in Ramallah that he will use his inaugural speech to declare an end to the use of arms to achieve Palestinian national aspirations.

Abbas told the Europeans all future inputs of money to the PA, whether from donors, Europeans, or Arab countries, would go to the PA treasury and would be overseen by Finance Minister Salam Fayyad.

On Sunday, Israel said it will allow nine members of the PLC who in the past have been described as "involved in terror" to take part in the PLC session to confirm the new government.

No reasons were given for the policy change, but it is probably because the nine said they would not take part in the session by video conference. This would prevent the necessary quorum for the PLC to confirm the cabinet.

Muslim Council ballot worries French Jews

By PHILIP CARMEL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

PARIS — French Jews may have hoped that the election of the first council to represent France's Muslim community of five million would act as a moderating influence on its members, but they received a rude awakening earlier this month.

Representatives from more than 900 mosques across France who cast their ballots for the new Muslim Council delivered a stinging slap to moderate candidates backed by the government.

The result was a personal defeat for the man seen as the modern face of French Islam, Dalil Boubakeur, the rector of the Grand Mosque in Paris.

The main winner was the National Federation of French Muslims, a group closely linked to the large Moroccan community in France and which receives financial and political backing from Rabat. The Moroccans are regarded as more conservative than the more integrated Algerians, and more mainstream than the fundamentalist French Union of Islamic Organizations.

Candidates from the union were the second largest group with 14 seats.

Trailing behind came candidates backed by the Paris Mosque, which only placed six of its supporters on the council.

The result is troubling for the Jewish community, since it comes as anti-Semitic incidents are at their highest level in more than a decade and the majority are carried out by Muslim youths.

French Jews and government officials had hoped the election of moderate elements to the council would provide Boubakeur with increased authority to take on the more radical elements within the Muslim community.

Almost 200 years after Napoleon set up the consistorial system as a means to fully integrate France's Jewish community, Interior Minister Nicolas Sarkozy decided the time had arrived to "bring French Islam out of the garages and basements."

Sarkozy's intention was to provide a representative voice for the Muslim community, as well as to assure it of state support for services such as the provision of mosques and halal meat, and burial rights within municipal cemeteries.

Moreover, he sought to unite the Muslim community around Boubakeur and diminish the role played by foreign-born preachers, whose more fundamentalist brand of Islam is taking root in mosques in working-class suburbs around the big cities.

In addition to Boubakeur's moderation, the Paris Mosque is also closely associated with France's largely integrated Algerian community. President Jacques Chirac had promised his Algerian counterpart during a recent state visit that the Algerians would maintain their traditional hegemony on the new council.

Leading moderates are unlikely to win

For the government and the Jewish community, the most worrying sign was the second-place showing by the French Union of Islamic Organizations, an organization with strong links to the Muslim Brotherhood fundamentalist group.

Such fears were exacerbated by the union's reaction to the election. In fact, union officials said, the group's success was even greater than it appeared.

"A lot of the Moroccans elected on the [National Federation of French Muslims] lists are closer to us than to the federation," Lhaj Thami Breeze, president of the union, told a recent conference of his organization.

The union's conference, which had the feel of a victory rally, was attended by Sarkozy, a clear indication that the government is aware of where the real power now lies in the Muslim community.

The final makeup of the Muslim Council's general assembly remains unclear because there will be runoff elections in some areas.

Nevertheless, leading moderates such as the imam of Marseille, who has appeared on platforms together with Jewish leaders at rallies against anti-Semitism, and the rector of Lyon's Grand Mosque who attended a service at a synagogue in the city's suburbs last year following a fire-bombing incident, are unlikely to win.

And the lack of support for Boubakeur and other candidates who have attempted to reach out to the Jewish community during the recent wave of anti-Semitic attacks, concerns Jewish leaders.

Officially, Jewish organizations were supportive of the moves to integrate the Muslim community, though they largely declined to comment after the elections for fear of further harming the more moderate groups on the council.

According to Bernard Kasovitch, who is responsible for relations with the Muslim community for the CRIF, the umbrella organization of secular French Jews, the poor showing of candidates supported by Boubakeur proved that in the current climate, it is difficult for moderate candidates to win support in their own community.

"We are ready to be partners with the Muslim community, but it is important to wait and see how they work together among themselves," Kasovitch told JTA. "Like most people in France, including Sarkozy, we are afraid of violence and extremism."

Moreover, the key test for the new council is how it adapts to the secular values of the French state, he said.

"They have to choose between whether they want to be guided by the sharia [Islamic law] or by the principles of the republic," Kasovitch said. "They should also be careful not to choose the wrong target. I tell them that Jews are not against Muslims, but rather that we want the same things."

Perhaps the first indication that the union is not prepared to tone down its demands came at its conference last week.

At first, Sarkozy received a rapturous ovation for his backing of the Muslim Council. But he was widely jeered when he said he would insist that Muslim women be photographed bareheaded for their national identity cards.

The union position also contrasts sharply with that of Boubakeur, who has called on French Muslims "to live with the times.

"It's not because the French law says so that we should change our behaviour, but because the world itself is changing," Boubakeur said.

For his part, Kasovitch, who with Boubakeur co-authored a book that promotes tolerance and understanding between French Jews and Muslims, said the union was "choosing the wrong fight. The issue of head covering within state institutions is a deliberate provocation. The government is not against religious expression," Kasovitch said. "It's a shame because there are so many things that need to be done for the Muslim community."

Ultimately, the elections have presented a vision of French Muslims that is considerably more extremist in tone than either the Jewish community or Sarkozy had hoped for.

Nevertheless, Sarkozy was quick to reassure the Jewish community.

"The danger would have been there even if we had done nothing," he said. "It is important that the republic engages in dialogue with Muslims, and that in itself is a factor in maintaining a peaceful climate."

But "this mutual recognition also gives us more latitude to fight against those imams who break the law in calling for violence and anti-Semitism," Sarkozy warned. "They will be expelled."

Asper spearheads Winnepeg human rights museum

The 21-storey museum will include a 70-metre Tower of Hope, where visitors will have the opportunity to express their opinions about human rights and what they have learned; a Canadian gallery, which will explore dark periods in Canadian history; a Holocaust gallery; a hall of fame and shame highlighting such moral icons as Mother Theresa and Nelson Mandela, as well as people who have become synonymous with evil; a Canadian commitment gallery, which will feature Canadian contributions to human rights; and the Garden of Contemplation, a "barometer of hate" that will measure hate levels around the world on a daily basis.

There will also be an exhibit on human rights in crisis, wireless palm pilots for students to record their impressions of the exhibits, and a "virtual museum" to connect the museum to the rest of the world through the Internet.

In his remarks, Asper, who, in the last 30 years has developed a media empire spanning three continents, said the museum will be an international symbol, celebrating a country "that is now one of the most inclusive and tolerant societies in the world, although we have had our darker periods."

Through its signature architecture, galleries, collections and programs, he said, the museum will address the "21st-century challenges of bridging and strengthening relationships between communities and vigilantly guarding our human rights. The message of universal individual rights can be Canada's legacy to the future."

The Asper Foundation is committed to an initial $50-million contribution. The federal government has already provided $600,000 to help pay for a feasibility study and has pledged another $30 million. The provincial government will give $20 million in land and tax breaks and an unspecified dollar contribution. A fundraising campaign will soon be under way to raise the balance of the funding.

The museum is expected to attract 300,000 visitors a year, including at least 100,000 students from across Canada whose visits will be subsidized by the Asper Foundation. For several years, the foundation has been paying to send all Winnipeg Jewish Grade 8 and 9 students and some non-Jewish Grade 9 students to Washington each year to tour the Holocaust Museum.

A planned $70-million second phase will include a 1,000 room dormitory to house visiting student groups.

"We are incredibly pleased with the reaction," Levy says. "We have had calls congratulating us from all around the world."

Israel mission cancelled; fear of SARS a factor

"We prefer flying El Al or Air Canada," he said.

Winnipeg's Jewish community has a goal of sending two missions a year to Israel – one in the fall and one in the spring. Fifty people signed up for the last mission, Oct. 28 to Nov. 2, 2002, including Manitoba Premier Gary Doer, and Health Minister Dave Chomiak.

The spring mission, scheduled for May 18 to 25, was to have included Winnipeg Mayor Glen Murray, who plans to go on the next mission, scheduled for November.

"We are confident that the November mission will go ahead as scheduled," Freedman said.

Syria feels the heat

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

Mideast Analysis

Since the informal end of the three-week war in Iraq, Syria has never been so isolated. With Saddam Hussein's brutal Ba'athist regime having been handily deposed by the United States and its allies, Bashar Assad, Syria's president, has become a real oddity – the last Ba'athist ruler in the Arab world. Syria, having been vociferously denounced by Washington for assisting Iraq, may yet come under more American pressure.

Last month, after U.S. Secretary of State Colin Powell threatened Syria with economic and political penalties, the United States cut off an oil pipeline from Iraq to Syria that had been a lucrative source of revenue for Damascus. And now, with the reintroduction of the Syria Accountability Act in the U.S. Congress, Syria faces additional sanctions, a possible development that Israel, Syria's undying foe, has encouraged. Washington, however, is not threatening Syria militarily.

Stigmatized by the Americans as a state that supports terrorism, Syria was criticized by the United States even before the war in Iraq began.

During a visit to Israel in February, John Bolton, the U.S. undersecretary of state, vaguely suggested it would be necessary to deal with "threats" emanating from Syria and its ally, Iran. James Woolsey, a former director of the Central Intelligence Agency, subsequently elaborated on that theme by singling out Syria and Islamic extremist groups as enemies of the United States.

With the allied invasion of Iraq, which Syria branded as an act of unbridled aggression, the United States stepped up its critique of Syria. Washington was none too pleased by Assad's comparison of the looming American occupation of Iraq with Israel's ill-fated 22-year occupation of southern Lebanon.

Several days after U.S. aircraft bombed a bus ferrying Syrian volunteers to Iraq, U.S. Secretary of Defence Donald Rumsfeld warned Damascus it would be held accountable for sending night vision goggles to Baghdad and allowing Syrians to fight alongside Iraqis.

In yet another barrage, Rumsfeld accused Damascus of letting high-ranking Iraqi government officials into Syria. Upping the ante, U.S. President George W. Bush warned the Syrians of serious consequences if they continued to harbour members of Saddam's fallen regime. Bush also spoke darkly about Syria's chemical weapons arsenal, and his press secretary, Ari Fleischer, described Syria as a "rogue nation."

Citing further "concerns" about the Syrians, Powell called on Syria to cease its support of terrorism. He was, of course, alluding to Syria's ties with Hezbollah, Hamas and Islamic Jihad. During the early 1980s, Hezbollah, with Iran's connivance, blew up the American embassy and the U.S. Marines barracks in Beirut. Later, again with Iran's help, Hezbollah fought a guerrilla war against Israel in southern Lebanon.

In addition, Syria permits Hamas and Islamic Jihad – which have perpetrated a succession of suicide bombings in Israel and the territories since 1994, and especially since the eruption of the second intifadah – to maintain offices in Damascus.

Powell's concern with terrorism is hardly surprising, given the Sept. 11, 2001, Arab terrorist incidents in New York City and Washington, D.C. Since then, the United States has displayed zero tolerance for terrorism, as exemplified by its relentless campaign against Al Qaeda.

More to the point, the Bush administration fears that its latest plan to defuse the Arab-Israeli dispute – the "road map" – may be sabotaged if Syria does not rein in Hamas, Islamic Jihad and Hezbollah, which all oppose a two-state solution.

Bush hopes that the momentum created by Saddam's downfall will shatter the status quo in the Middle East by encouraging Israel and the Palestinians to settle their differences, by promoting democracy in Iraq and, in general, by encouraging moderation and stability in the region. But these objectives may remain a pipe dream unless Syria mends its ways. Last week, in a bit of damage control, Syria announced it had sealed its border to Iraqis.

In all fairness, Syria has not played a completely destructive role in the area. Syria held peace talks with Israel in 1999 and 2000, although these negotiations bore no fruit. As well, Syria helped the United States break up Al Qaeda cells in Europe and voted for last year's United Nations resolution regarding Iraq's weapons of mass destruction. But in all other respects, Syria has been manifestly unhelpful.

April 21

• Arab countries may renew a boycott of companies doing business with Israel. Representatives of 15 Arab states met in Syria to discuss the matter. A Syrian official said the ban should remain in place until "the liberation of all occupied Arab lands under Israeli control."

April 22

• Israelis in the West Bank should begin pressuring cabinet ministers and MKs to oppose the U.S.-backed "road map" for peace, National Union MK Yuri Stern told a meeting of hawkish Israeli legislators. Israelis who oppose the plan have apparently been alarmed by Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's mention of specific towns that may have to be abandoned in a peace deal with the Palestinians.

April 23

• A last-minute intervention by Egypt's intelligence services chief Omar Suleiman ended a crisis in the Palestinian leadership struggle when Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat approved a government put together by prime minister designate Mahmoud Abbas (Abu Mazen).

April 24

• A security guard at the Kfar Saba train station died while preventing a suicide bomber from entering the facility. When the guard demanded to see his ID card, the bomber detonated his explosive. Thirteen people were injured.

April 25

• Fearing SARS, an El Al flight attendant was admitted to hospital in Tel Aviv after a flight from Hong Kong. X-rays of the woman's lungs were negative, but she was isolated from other patients. It was the sixth case in Israel in which officials suspected an individual had been infected with the virus. Testing concluded SARS was not present in the five previous cases.

Be Careful What You Wish For...

adapted from the Midrash on Genesis 1:14-19, the fourth day of Creation

...And God made the two big lights, the big one to illuminate the day and the small one to illuminate the night... Genesis 1:16

The fourth day of Creation had arrived. The Earth had already been filled with trees, lakes, mountains, and vast oceans. And today God had created the brilliant sun and the equally brilliant moon to illuminate it, and had placed planets orbiting around them.

But all was not well, for the sun and the moon had both been created the same size, and the Moon was quite displeased with this arrangement.

The Moon questioned the Almighty, "Why did You make the Sun and me the same size? What I mean is, You made two realms, spiritual and physical. They're not equal. The spiritual realm is by far the greatest. You created fire and water. Are they equal? No, they're not. Water is much stronger, since it can extinguish a fire just — like — THAT!"

As he said the word "that" he did a little twist, and spun himself closer to the sun. He smiled a radiant smile, which for him was pretty easy to do. After all, he shone like the Sun, too. Then the moon spoke again: "I have a suggestion. How about shrinking the sun just a little bit? Then you could put him into orbit around that blue planet you created. After that, you can have that blue planet and all those other planets orbit around me." The moon paused, smiled, and asked the Almighty, "What do you think?"

God regarded him coolly for a moment before he responded, "Good point. Two kings can't share one crown. One of you must go. Correct?"

"Of course!" shouted the moon enthusiastically.

"Fine with me," replied God.

"Hey!" shrieked the moon as it quickly diminished in size and radiance. "No, not me! You're shrinking the wrong one! Look what You're doing! No! No! No!" he squeaked as he found himself being sucked into Earth's gravitational pull. But it was too late. He was now a small, scarred, gray mass, which was orbiting around that blue planet which he had dwarfed just minutes before.

"Well, what do you think?" asked God.

"What do I think? Couldn't You have shrunk the sun instead of...." The moon broke off suddenly when he remembered just to Whom he was speaking.

"I don't think so," said God. "I really don't think so. Look at how the sun behaved. He didn't argue with you even when you denounced him. He is truly deserving of his size."

"But what about my light? It's gone!" wailed the moon.

"You can reflect the Sun's light," explained God. "But this may console you. The Jews will use you to calculate the months in their calendar." And with that, the Almighty placed stars in the sky to light it up, and to restore some of the brightness He had removed when the moon lost its radiance. The Milky Way unfolded in a beautiful canopy of stars. Galaxy upon galaxy appeared. But the moon wasn't paying any attention to it.

"Do You think," he began humbly, "that one day, maybe even soon, I'll be as big as I used to be?"

"In the end of days, I will restore you to your previous size and grandeur."

"Oh, yes!!" laughed the moon. "Do you hear that, sun? Someday I'll be as big as you again!"

"Of course," continued God, "When that happens, I will make the sun seven times as big as it is now."

Even during war, a family finds goodness and a goat

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

Most of us have never drunk goat's milk. Even more of us have never had a goat for a pet. Anna did.

Anna is a little girl, the heroine of Anna's Goat, by Janice Kulyk Keefer, with illustrations by Janet Wilson (Orca Book Publishers, 2000). Her story shows how, with love, courage and a little imagination, we can overcome terrible problems.

The book is set during World War II when many families left their homes and went far away to escape from the Nazis. Anna's parents and her older sister, Wanda, went to a place where it was very cold most of the time. That's where Anna was born.

Things were very hard. "It was always winter in the faraway place where Anna was born. There was hardly any wood to burn to keep their one room warm, and hardly any food to eat. The grownups had to work at the factory all day to help the soldiers who were fighting for them in the war." Anna's father had to go to work in another village.

At first, Anna was all right, because she could live on her mother's breast milk. Unfortunately, because her mother was working so hard and didn't have enough food to eat herself, her milk dried up. She went to the factory, and told her problem to the village women. Although they didn't have much either, they felt sorry for the small, hungry baby, and lent the family a goat.

Now the goat was a real help. Not only could Anna, her sister and her mother drink its milk, but they could keep warm by cuddling up beside it. Of course, they could also play with it. Mind you, the goat, as goats do, "tried to eat, not just hay, but spoons and candles and even towels dancing on the washing line!"

Finally, the war ended, and the family could go home. But the goat had to stay behind. Its owners needed the goat themselves, and besides, the animal could not have travelled the long distance to the family's home.

The city where they used to live had been bombed into rubble and had to be rebuilt. There were no schools, so the children played in the rubble.

One of the most exciting things the children did was to find treasures to keep – "pennies, or beads or bits of painted china." But Anna could never find anything special enough for her.

When she went crying to her mother, Mother pulled out a raggedy blue towel, with a fringe. It was made from the soft fur of the goat, and Anna "could feel, like a bright, strong star in her hands, the heartbeat of her nanny goat."

Anna's Goat is based on a true story. But it is not just one true story – there were many small children, and grown-ups too, who had to find their own special comfort at a very difficult time.

Chaplin's Dictator challenged Nazi regime

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

This year's Toronto Jewish Film Festival runs May 3-11 at the Bloor Cinema, 506 Bloor St. W. [416- 324-9121] The CJN continues previewing some of the films.

The Tramp and The Dictator. This new hour-long British-made documentary looks at the contrasting worlds of the great comedian and movie star Charlie Chaplin and Nazi leader Adolf Hitler through the worthy prism of Chaplin's celebrated 1940 film, The Great Dictator.

Many people who have never seen The Great Dictator are familiar with its most famous scene, in which the title character, Adenoid Hynkel, plays with a balloon globe of the world as he imagines becoming its supreme dictator. Besides playing the Hitler character, Chaplin doubles as a Jewish barber who becomes a resistance fighter in the ghetto. The Great Dictator was Chaplin's first talkie and one of the first American films to unabashedly attack the Nazi regime.

As directors Kevin Brownlow and Michael Kloft demonstrate, Chaplin and Hitler were both born in the same week in April 1889 and both had similar childhood backgrounds. The physical resemblance between them was uncanny. The documentary finds evidence that Hitler viewed Chaplin's mocking work not once but twice, and might even have laughed uproariously at scenes that, by all reckoning, should have insulted and enraged him.

The documentary benefits enormously from some recently-found footage shot on the film set as it adeptly puts The Great Dictator into the context of its times and offers a multitude of behind-the-scenes glimpses. For example, we learn that Chaplin agonized over the script and revised it compulsively during the lengthy production schedule; he ultimately stepped out of character to deliver a brief political lecture as himself in the closing scene.

The Tramp and The Dictator is being screened with an early Chaplin silent short, The Pawnshop (1916), in which Chaplin plays a hapless assistant to a Jewish pawnshop owner. Friday May 9, 3 p.m. A screening of The Great Dictator follows at 5 p.m.

A Trumpet in the Wadi. Lina and Slava Chaplin, the Russian immigrants to Israel who made this ambitious Israeli film, were probably not related to the above-mentioned Charlie, since their cinematic offering seems more along the lines of dramatic tragedy than the sort of blithe comedy that was the trademark of their trampish namesake.

As a Russian-Jewish immigrant musician, Alex rents an apartment from a Christian-Arab family in a neighbourhood near Haifa, becoming not a fiddler but a trumpeter on their roof.

Floating above their house like a Chagall phantasm, he also manages to invade their sympathies, and falls in love with their daughter Huda, who blooms as a willing Juliet to this unlikely Romeo, even as the intifadah plays out like a tragic chorus on their television screens.

When the two announce their engagement, her grandfather warns, "The dogs on both sides will bite you," and her mother says: "Take him far away from this country." But it's only a matter of time before a Montague slays a Capulet, thus dooming the star-crossed lovers.

This provocative, original tale won the best film award in the Haifa Film Festival of 2001, despite its uneven direction and loose script (adapted from the book by Sami Michael). Further, the jumpy, cinéma-vérité style of cinematography is not always appropriate to the action, and the production sometimes has the look and feel of a low-budget television drama.

The excellent ensemble, however – especially Alexander Sendorovich as Alex and Khawlah Hag-Debsy as Huda – goes far towards reversing these defects. A Trumpet in the Wadi is being screened on Monday May 5 at 3 p.m.

Atlantic Drift. Toronto resident Henry Wellisch was interviewed extensively for this French-Austrian co-production about a convoy of some 2,000 European Jewish immigrants bound for Palestine who got sidetracked to the isolated tiny island of Mauritius, where they sat out the war under conditions only marginally better than the concentration camps they had escaped.

Director Michel Daeron combed many archives to find the rare historical footage that complements this little-known story about a ship like the Exodus that met such a markedly different fate.

Although the film might have benefited in places from a central narrative voice, the director allows the story to tell itself through the dramatic juxtaposition of voices and images.

The story unfolds like a lazy trip down a river (the Danube) into a metaphorical "heart of darkness" which lies waiting in a Mauritius prison. The film focuses on several survivors, including Wellisch, who make return trips to their childhood neighbourhoods, and whose reminiscences and diaries bring the story fully to life.

Atlantic Drift is being screened on Tuesday May 6 at 1 p.m.

Y.I.D. – Yehudeem in the Diaspora. Director Igal Hecht has patched together a rare documentary about the Toronto Jewish community – more specifically, about the relations between the Israelis living here and the rest of the community – and this alone has earned it a coveted spot in the festival line-up.

The third-largest in North America, Toronto's 170,000-strong Jewish community is certainly a worthy and overdue subject for a documentary. This noble early attempt examines a particularly narrow slice of the whole. We see familiar footage ad infinitum of the Bathurst-Steeles corridor, Earl Bales Park and other locations, and hear from a few alienated young people expressing immature opinions – but without enough requisite balance.

Preferring to see the proverbial glass as half-empty instead of half-full, Hecht takes an unswervingly negative approach to the subject, and his unsympathetic thesis becomes increasingly unfocused as the film progresses. What starts off as a harsh critique of a cold and insulated Jewish community becomes, despite itself, a portrait of a community belatedly waking up to the new threats faced in the post-Oslo, post-9/11 world.

Hecht excels in airing stereotypes, but his evidence that Toronto Jews have not done enough to welcome Israeli Jews into the mainstream is unconvincing. It is also a mistake to portray our diverse community, into which many historic waves of Jewish immigrants have already been integrated to various degrees, as monolithic.

What redeems Yehudeem in the Diaspora is that a credible young documentary filmmaker has turned to the subject at all. The film has many points of interest. One hopes that director Hecht and producer Ron Furman (both of whom are expected at the screening) turn to examining other aspects of our community in a more sympathetic and balanced light.

The screening is on Monday, May 5 at 5 p.m. and includes the new Canadian short, Falafel (director Avner Levona in attendance).

It Runs in the Family nothing more than a formulaic comedy

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

What a family!

Try as they might, they cannot communicate with each other.

In Fred Schepisi's film, It Runs in the Family, now playing in theatres, a father and a son, Mitchell (Kirk Douglas) and Alex (Michael Douglas), have little in common and no rapport.

About the only person capable of bridging the lingering animosities and misunderstandings that run through this cantankerous family is Evelyn (Diana Douglas), Mitchell's level-headed wife.

The film, the first to pair the veteran actor Kirk Douglas (aka Issur Danielovitch) and his son Michael, is a comedy that delights in poking fun at the very human frailties of the Grombergs.

Mitchell's ailing brother, whose distant, frightened look signals an advanced case of dementia, breaks wind, prompting hearty guffaws from three generations of Grombergs sitting around the table trying to make sense of the Passover story.

The humour coursing through It Runs in the Family is not usually as crass as this. Jesse Wigutow's script is somewhat more literate.

Still, this is not a film that raises too many expectations, or meets them. In substance and tone, it is nothing more or less than formulaic.

Kirk Douglas, in effect, plays himself, a stroke victim making the best of a bad situation.

A retired high-powered lawyer who lives in the lap of opulence, Mitchell is the epitome of a crotchety old man challenging his mortality. Were it not for his wife, he would be even more unbearable.

Alex, also a filthy rich lawyer, works in the Gromberg law firm, salving his conscience as a volunteer in a community soup kitchen.

His wife, a psychologist, is stunned when she learns that Alex may be having an affair.

Even as their marriage flounders, Alex and Rebecca obsess over their inability to form a meaningful relationship with their two sons.

Although, at 86, he is way past his prime, the feisty Kirk Douglas steals the movie without much effort. Next to him, everyone else seems like a forgettable stock figure.

Yet even the redoubtable Douglas cannot lift It Runs in the Family beyond the realm of the ordinary.

Mephisto screening at Goethe

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Mephisto, Istvan Szabo's tightly coiled political drama, is about an actor in Nazi Germany who sells his soul in the hot pursuit of success.

The recipient of the 1982 Oscar for best foreign picture, Mephisto will be screened at the Goethe Institut, 163 King St. W. on May 6 at 7: 30 p.m.

Based on the career of Gustaf Grundgens, this 144-minute film is the cautionary tale of a overweeningly ambitious individual who sets aside his beliefs at the drop of a hat.

In an incandescent performance, Klaus Maria Brandauer portrays Hendrik Hofgen, who believes an actor is "nothing more than a mask."

When a pro-Nazi actor in the troupe claims the theatre is "Jew-ridden," Hofgen has him fired.

With Adolf Hitler's appointment as chancellor, Hofgen's wife (Krystyna Janda) urges him to leave Germany.

Warning him that artistic freedom will be curtailed by the Nazis, she implores him to leave Germany, but to no avail. Hofgen says he would be a fish out of water without the German language.

Having committed himself to Germany, no matter what the consequences, he accepts a theatre role that uncannily mirrors his own moral flexibility.

Thanks to his actorly skills, Hofgen is drawn into the circle of the prime minister (Rolf Hoppe), a greasy ideologue whose goal is to cleanse German culture of its "foreign" (read Jewish) and Bolshevik elements.

Klaus Maria Brandauer in Mephisto

Currying favour with him, Hofgen acknowledges he made mistakes as a leftist actor. His toadying pays dividends. The prime minister, his patron, appoints Hofgen manager of the Prussian State Theatre in Berlin.

He agrees to perform the plays of mediocre playwrights promoted by the Nazis, knowing full well that the best of the lot have been hounded into exile.

Yet Hofgen is not a completely empty vessel. He tries to save the jobs of employees whose racial stock is under suspicion and he lobbies the prime minister on behalf of an actor friend who has been blackballed.

But then, in an electrifying turn on the stage that elates the prime minister, he portrays Hamlet as a Nazi-like Nordic hero. Brandauer is brilliant, endowing his character with just the right blend of submission and rebelliousness. Hoppe, his bald pate glimmering and his eyes shining brightly, equally acquits himself with panache.

Szabo directs Mephisto with a firm, subtle hand. This is cinema of a high order.<None>

Business Profile

Entrepreneur, politician all set for golf season

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

After a long and miserable winter, Joshua Cooper is eager to get back into the swing of things again.

He and his students will get their chance on May 3, when the golfing season officially gets under way at his instructional golf camps.

On that day, golfers of all ages and talents will line up at tees, carefully take aim and swat their clubs at little white balls resting daintily on fairways.

The company runs two golf camps in the Toronto area and a third camp in the Muskokas.

In an average year, some 1,000 golfers, about half of whom are rank beginners, flock to Cooper's camps for tips on such basics as stance, alignment, grip, swing, putting, tempo, scoring and etiquette.

Touted by Profit Magazine as one of Canada's fastest growing companies and accredited by the Ontario Camping Association, Par Golf Camps was established by Cooper 11 years ago.

The junior camp at the Annandale Golf and Country Club caters to kids and teenagers from eight to 18.

The Sparrow Lake Sports Lodge, which Cooper and his partners bought four years ago, is essentially for families.

"Basically, we teach golf in a day camp setting," explained Cooper, a certified golf professional whose late grandfather and role model ran a string of local golf courses.

Adults can avail themselves of one-day classes where they review the basics. Alternatively, they can sign up for two or three-day advanced packages.

Juniors, on the other hand, can choose from one week, two week and one month programs.

Although Cooper has been a golfer for close to 30 years, it was necessity rather than a love of the game that prompted him to set up Par Golf Camps.

As he put it, "It all began because I couldn't find a job."

The son of Allan and Bonnie Cooper, he graduated from York University with a BA, majoring in geography.

Not certain what he would do for the rest of his life, he took a securities course and a business degree from Seneca College.

Venturing forth into an employment market scarred by a recession, Cooper submitted 350 job applications, fairly confident he would be snapped up.

"I was looking for anything," he said. "I just wanted to work. I got tons of answers – all no's. No one was hiring, or hiring me."

He thought his luck had changed when a bank called him in for an interview. But much to his disappointment, the position was given to someone who had been an intern teller.

Cooper's job record did not dovetail with the bank's needs. He had been a counsellor at Camp Timberlane, had coached at a baseball camp and had scooped ice cream at a Baskin Robbins outlet.

"One day, the idea hit me. "There was literally no place in Toronto for a kid to learn golf."

The concept, though obvious, seemed right to Cooper. "I loved camp and I loved golf."

Acting on his instincts, Cooper rented land from the Annandale Golf and Country Club, whose facilities include 18-hole and 4 hole Par 3 courses, a driving range, putting greens as well as chipping and pitching greens.

"I called existing day camps to see if they could bring their campers to me. They all said no. 'Kids don't play golf,' they claimed."

At his brother's suggestion, Cooper placed an ad in a newspaper, and the rest is history.

"We started off with one putting green and one bunker. Now we have four putting greens and one bunker."

Cooper, who was introduced to golf at the age of five by his grandfather Mike Lawrence, has never lost his enthusiasm for the game.

"It's the only true individual sport. On a recreational level, it's you against the course. And it's a sociable sport where you can meet a lot of people."

Golf runs deep in his family.

His grandfather owned golf courses in the city, and an uncle, Michael Lyons, is also very active in golf management.

Joshua Cooper

Cooper's father, a lawyer, has no connection with golf. But his mother, a property manager, grew up with it.

Mary, Cooper's wife, is not a golfer. But their young children, Mikey and Lexi, have the makings of avid golfers.

"You should see Mikey's swing," he said. "And Lexi can putt."

For the past seven years, Cooper has been the coach of the Canadian Maccabi youth team.

"We've won medals every year – gold, silver and bronze."

Cooper, though, has not attended a single competition. "They're always held at the height of the golf camp season."

"I felt it needed to be done. I was embarrassed by the rhetoric coming out of Ottawa. We achieved our goal. We were on CNN, ABC and all the Canadian television networks."

Last month, just hours after he was interviewed for this story, Cooper was selected as the Canadian Alliance's candidate in the riding of Thornhill, the largest "Jewish" constituency in Canada.

In the next election, which he figures will be in about a year, he will run against Liberal party incumbent Elinor Caplan, the current minister of citizenship and immigration.

"I can win in Thornhill," he said, exuding confidence. "Absolutely."

Cooper claims that the Alliance is Canada's sole pro-Israel party and that the Liberals have "turned their back on our community."

He cites two examples. "The Alliance forced the Liberals to ban Hezbollah, and Caplan took Magen David Adom to court to try to revoke its charitable status."

Should he defeat Caplan and become an MP, Cooper has no intention of giving up his duties at Par Golf Camps.

"MPs sit for six months and are off for the summer."

So as far as he is concerned, it would be business as usual on the driving range, even if Thornhill's voters select him as their member of parliament.

PLANNING FOR RETIREMENT?

Were you happy with the amount of income tax you paid last year?

There is no limit to the amount of income tax that the government will accept from you.

However, there are ways to pay less tax, legally, of course!

We can show you how to use dividend income or capital gains, which are taxed at a lower rate than interest income, or Return of Capital products, which incur little or no tax, to help you reduce the amount of tax you must pay.

Klezmer concert to aid Argentine Jews

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Sarah Zelcer and Rachel Lasry have a message for Toronto klezmer aficionados. Mark June 3 on you calendars, because that's when one of South America's foremost klezmer ensembles, Klezmer En Buenos Aires, will perform in Toronto.

A feature performer at two past Ashkenaz Festivals, Klezmer En Buenos Aires will do more than simply entertain a Toronto audience, they say. The evening is being billed as an important fundraising event to help provide relief to the cash-strapped Jewish population of Buenos Aires.

As spokespeople for Ve'ahavta, a Jewish relief non-governmental organization (NGO), Lasry and Zelcer say the concert will help bring to public attention the dire circumstances facing Jews in Argentina.

Funds raised at the concert are earmarked for a pharmaceutical program in Buenos Aires. Ve'ahavta has, in the past, solicited donations of badly needed drugs – everything from antibiotics to hypertension medications – for the Central Community Pharmacy. The pharmacy is a project of the Foundation Tzedakah, an Argentine NGO, and the Joint Distribution Committee (the Joint).

Last summer, Ve'ahavta sent about $10,000 worth of pharmaceuticals and medical supplies to the centre, Lasry said.

Since the Argentine economy collapsed a couple of years ago, the country's population, including its Jewish citizens, have been thrown out of work, lost their savings and found themselves facing dire poverty. More than half of Argentina's population is now living below the poverty line.

Zelcer said many Canadian Jews are just not aware at how bad things have become in Argentina. "There is a true sense of desperation," she said. "You were once a thriving community and you've been thrust into a position of desperation. You don't know where your next meal is coming from."

Ve'ahavta is working with a collection of Toronto synagogues, rabbinical organizations and campus groups to raise public awareness.

With awareness will come financial support, Zelcer suggested. In addition to providing badly need medication, funds raised in Canada will go to provide food vouchers and skills training. Ve'ahavta has a good working relationship with local Jewish agencies in Argentina and will assist them to provide aid, she said.

The Argentine agencies, in conjunction with the Joint, have established a network of 71 Comprehensive Social Assistance Centres across the country to provide a variety of social services, and some of the money raised in Toronto may be allocated through these agencies, Zelcer stated.

This past winter, Lasry, Ve'ahavta's international program director, and Rabbi Danny Gottlieb attended a conference in Sao Paulo, Brazil that focused on the poverty facing South American Jews and on community efforts to ameliorate it. The conference, sponsored by the World Jewish Congress and the Inter-American Development Bank, provided a forum for the Canadian visitors to develop relationships with local Jews who are involved in poverty-alleviation efforts, Lasry said.

Israel faces Cyprus in Euro 2004 qualifier

By CJN NEWS SERVICES

JERUSALEM — Israel's national 21-man soccer squad announced last week includes first-timers Gadi Brumer and Ben Luz and omits key midfielder Eyal Berkovic of Manchester City.

Israel national team coach Avraham Grant named the team for this week's Euro 2004 home qualifier against Cyprus, which Israel was to have played in Palermo, Sicily on Wednesday.

Berkovic's absence will no doubt have been missed.

The inspirational Manchester City midfielder has been out of action since February after undergoing a hernia operation. He missed the last two qualifiers against France earlier this month and against Cyprus last month.

As well as Berkovic, Israel was also scheduled to be without two other midfielders – Maccabi Tel Aviv's Avi Nimni and Baruch Dago.

But Grant's worries did not end there. The Israeli coach also had to monitor the situation on the left side of his defence, as both Adoram Keisi and Yigal Antebi were nursing injuries.

Three players were drafted to replace the injured men, with defenders Ori Uzan and Brumer and midfielder Luz getting call-ups. Of those, only Uzan, 24, had never played in national colours before.

Grant said last week that he hoped his team would be able to recreate the same good form it showed in its narrow 2-1 defeat to France in Israel's home game in Palermo on April 2.

"I think we played to a good standard, particularly in the last game [against France], despite the result," he said.

With UEFA, European soccer's governing body, refusing to allow Israel to host matches on home soil due to the threat of terror attacks, Israel was scheduled to host the Cypriots in the Sicilian capital.

The match was postponed last October while the Israel Football Association tried to find a solution to hosting home matches.

Grant said if Israel had hosted France in Tel Aviv, things might have been very different. "I can only imagine what the result might have been had we played that way against France in front of 50,000 spectators at the National Stadium," he said.

In earlier games against Cyprus and France, Israel's performances were mixed at best. Against Cyprus, it played mediocre and uninspiring football, while against the reigning European champions, its performance was encouraging – even if it failed to register any points.

Without improved play against Cyprus this week, Israel's campaign to qualify for next summer's European Championships could well be over.

The goalkeeper: The professional opinion of Israel and Maccabi Tel Aviv goalkeeping coach Alexander Obarov is important to Grant, but it is not, apparently, the final word. Ahead of the game against France, Obarov recommended that Shavit Elimelech replace Dudu Awat between the posts. After Zinadine Zidane's first-half goal in Palermo, Grant probably understood he had made a mistake in starting Awat.

Tactics: The game against Cyprus left the feeling that Israel wasn't capable of playing any better, especially in the absence of Berkovic. The game against France, despite Israel's loss, left a feeling that perhaps Israel had greater potential than it showed in its mediocre performance against Cyprus.

Cyprus plays with two strikers up front, a formation that forced Grant to play with three fullbacks. France however fielded a sole striker with three attacking midfielders against Israel, causing Grant to rethink his defensive lineup. Since taking over as national team coach, Grant has alternated between a 3:5:2 lineup and a 4:5:1 lineup. For this week's game against Cyprus, following the "experiment" against France, Grant was pondering whether to drop the third fullback and leave Brumer on the substitutes bench.

Benayoun: During Israel's trip to Malta, Yossi Benayoun commented that he deserved to play alongside Haim Revivo and Berkovic. However, Benayoun received a place alongside Grant on the substitutes bench. As in Elimelech's case, careless talk kept Benayoun out of the game. Since then, Benayoun has also adopted the silent tactic – not that it has helped. In Israel's two previous games against France and Cyprus, Benayoun was only brought on in the closing minutes of the game.

Before this week's game, Grant had to decide whether Benayoun would continue to enjoy his company on the bench or whether he would finally be given the chance to prove his mettle.

Bridge with Gitelman

The American Contract Bridge League's Spring North American Championships took place in Philadelphia March 5-16. Here is what happened to me and my partner (Brad Moss from New York City) on one of the most talked-about deals from this tournament:

North (Fred)	South (Brad)
♠ J10752	♠
♥ 4	♥ AK97652
♦ Q865	♦ AK10843
♣ Q103	♣

West	North	East	South
			1♥
2♣	Pass	2♠	3♦
4♣	Pass	Pass	5♣
Pass	5♦	Pass	5♠
Pass	7♦	Pass	Pass
Pass

You don't get dealt hands like my partner's very often, but Brad bid his cards masterfully. He realized that it was going to be very difficult to describe his strange hand to me so he adopted the strategy of trying to keep the bidding low at the start of the auction in the hope that one of us would eventually learn enough to select the best final contract.

That explains why Brad bid only 1♥ at his first turn and only 3♦ at his second turn. He came out of the woodwork when it was his third turn by cue-bidding 5♣. Since the opponents had already bid clubs, Brad's 5♣ bid announced an extremely powerful hand.

Perhaps I should have bid 6♦ at this point, but I was not yet able to see the picture that Brad was trying to paint. The lights went on when Brad unexpectedly cue-bid 5♠ at his next turn. By bidding both of the opponents suits and forcing our partnership to the 6-level, it was now clear to me that Brad thought that a grand slam was possible.

Given that Brad was inviting me to bid 7♦, I could hardly refuse! After all, I had passed twice already and then grudgingly showed diamond support when I was forced to do so. I might have had a completely worthless hand for the bidding so far. My actual hand, with 4 diamonds to the Queen and what looked like a key singleton in hearts, was far from useless. I leapt to 7♦ with complete confidence that Brad would be able to win all 13 tricks without breathing hard.

And that is exactly what he did! The play of this hand was not nearly as interesting as the bidding.

Hopefully this deal provides some insight into how an expert partnership is able to deal with the bidding of unusual hands. At the highest levels bidding is much more about judgment and partnership trust than it is about point count or conventions.

Maple Dressing
1/4 cup mayonnaise
1/4 cup maple sugar
3 tblsp. white wine vinegar
2 tsp. white sugar
1/2 cup vegetable oil

Salad 1/2 cup dried tart cherries 10 cups lightly packed salad greens
1/2 cup chopped walnuts, toasted
2 Granny Smith apples, peeled, cored, cut into matchstick-size strips

Whisk mayonnaise, maple syrup, vinegar and sugar in medium bowl to blend. Gradually whisk in oil until mixture thickens slightly. Season to taste with salt and pepper. (Can be prepared 3 days ahead. Cover and refrigerate. Rewhisk before using.)

Toss greens, apples, cherries, and 1/4 cup walnuts in large bowl to combine. Toss with enough dressing to coat. Divide salad equally among plates. Sprinkle with remaining 1/4 cup walnuts and serve. Makes 6 servings. (Bon Appetite, Sept. 2002)

DearKarilani

Dear Karilani,

I am a high school senior and next month is our school prom. I have been looking forward to going all through high school, except now that it is so close I am having second thoughts about going. Almost all the girls in my grade have dates to go with, but no one has asked me. I guess I am just not as pretty or as thin as the other girls are. The prom is supposed to be fun, but so far all it is doing is upsetting me. What do you think I should do?

Against Prom

Dear Against Prom,

It sounds as if your problem is not that you do not have a prom date, but rather that you have low self-confidence. Before any boy will realize how beautiful and smart you are, you need to discover that yourself. Instead of comparing yourself to other girls, focus on the characteristics that you do like about yourself. There is nothing more attractive than a girl who feels good about herself.

Instead of waiting to be asked to the prom, why not ask someone yourself? Chances are, there is a boy who would love to go with you, only he is too shy to ask.

As well, remember that the prom isn't only about having someone to go with. Sometimes going with a large group of people can be more fun than going with just one person. Gather other friends without dates and you can all go together. This will let you spend your evening with a number of people, and you will not be restricted to one person. You will have plenty of opportunities to date later in life; the prom is not your only chance.

Finally, you need to put everything into perspective. It is easy to get carried away with prom preparations and it can all become overwhelming. However, you need to remember that it is only one evening, and no matter what happens, your life will be back to normal the next morning.

About Teens

Dear Karilani is written on a rotating basis by three high school students. The drawing is a composite. We welcome questions from our readers. Please mail, e-mail or fax them to The CJN.

Israel missions undeterred by SARS

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Fourteen Israel-bound missions originating in Toronto will depart in the next two months, despite concerns over the SARS outbreak.

There have been no changes to the number of missions nor the number of participants, said Samara Kleinman, marketing and public relations manager with the Israel Government Tourism Office (IGTO) in Toronto. "I have not heard of any [groups] in Toronto postponing trips to Israel. Israel is welcoming all travellers from Toronto and Canada."

Two weeks ago, Winnipeg's Jewish federation announced it was cancelling its May mission to Israel partly out of public concern about transiting through Toronto, the epicentre for SARS cases in Canada. The Winnipeg federation made its decision before the World Health Organization (WHO) issued a travel advisory for Toronto, suggesting travellers avoid the city. Last week, the WHO rescinded the advisory, saying SARS appears to have been contained.

Fourteen trips on schedule

Kleinman said Israeli authorities had implemented screening procedures at Ben-Gurion Airport, taking passengers' temperatures as they enter the terminal and asking them several questions related to SARS.

However, following WHO's second directive, Israel's Health Ministry removed Toronto from its list of SARS hot spots.

As of The CJN's press time, it remained unclear whether the SARS screening of Toronto passengers was continuing, as Ben-Gurion airport was closed for two days last week during a nationwide strike.

Zundel may be closer to deportation

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Ernst Zundel may have spent his last weekend in Canada as federal officials last week issued a security certificate declaring the neo-Nazi propagandist a threat to Canada's national security.

The certificate is subject to review by a Federal Court, but if a federal judge finds the certificate reasonable, Zundel, 64, may be deported from Canada as early as this week.

Zundel's removal to his native Germany, where he faces jail for violating the country's anti-hate laws, would bring to an end a more than 20-year saga of Holocaust denial, court cases, appeals and human rights tribunals.

The News in Brief

Canada

Anti-hate March

TORONTO — The grassroots group Canadians Against Anti-Semitism will be holding its second annual Canadian March for Humanity in Toronto on June 8 at 3 p.m. International human rights lawyer and MP Irwin Cotler, and Ontario Chief Justice Roy McMurtry will lead the march, which will begin at Avenue Road and Bloor Street and head to Queen's Park.

Israel

Yom Hashoah Marked

JERUSALEM — Israelis came to a halt last Tuesday as a two-minute-long siren was sounded in memory of the six million Jews murdered in the Holocaust. The siren was followed by a wreath-laying ceremony at the Yad Vashem Holocaust Memorial in Jerusalem and name-reading ceremonies at the Knesset and around the country. As part of this year's Holocaust Martyrs and Heroes Remembrance Day observances, Conservative synagogues in Israel and around the world were holding readings of the first liturgical text marking the Holocaust.

Abbas and the Shoah

JERUSALEM — Palestinian Authority Prime Minister Mahmoud Abbas should visit the U.S. Holocaust museum, Democratic U.S. congressman and Holocaust survivor Tom Lantos said last week during a visit to Israel. Lantos said he issued the in-person invitation to Abbas because he "needs considerable insight about what happened during the Holocaust." Abbas has been criticized for his 1982 doctoral thesis that minimizes the Holocaust and accuses the Zionists of collaborating with the Nazis. Abbas has said he wrote the thesis at a time when Israel was the PLO's enemy.

Abbas and Arafat

JERUSALEM — Incoming Palestinian Authority Prime Minister Mahmoud Abbas said last week he would not travel abroad to discuss peace until Israel allows PA President Yasser Arafat to travel freely again. Abbas' comments were seen as an attempt to raise his standing in Palestinian eyes.

Abbas and Terror

JERUSALEM — The new Palestinian Authority prime minister should be investigated for his alleged role in financing the 1972 Munich Olympics massacre, an Israeli law group says. Shurat Hadin-Israel Law Center said Mahmoud Abbas helped finance the PLO's Black September group that committed the attack, which killed 11 Israeli athletes. Both Israel and Germany have legal jurisdiction to prosecute those involved in the attack, but it's unclear whether this applies to Abbas, who now holds a top position in the PA.

World

Anti-Jewish Violence Up

JERUSALEM — There were more violent anti-Semitic acts last year than there have been for more than a decade, a new report from Tel Aviv University says. There were 311 cases worldwide, said the report, issued jointly last week with the World Jewish Congress. Western Europe led the world in anti-Semitic violence, with France, Belgium and Britain topping the list.

Charles Goes to Shul

MANCHESTER — Britain's Prince Charles last week inaugurated a synagogue in Manchester. In addition to unveiling a plaque and planting a tree at the Bowden Shul, he attended a service and two receptions. A spokesperson for the prince emphasized the importance he places on such invitations.

Deportation Ordered

PHILADELPHIA — A U.S. immigration court has ordered the deportation of a former Nazi concentration camp guard to Ukraine, Poland or Germany. The court found that Theodor Szchinskyj, 79, a resident of West Chester, Pa., served in the SS Death's Head guard unit at Gross-Rosen, Sachsenhausen and Warsaw concentration camps from 1943 to 1945. Szehinskyj is a native of Malnow, a town in pre-war Poland that is now part of Ukraine.

Cemetery Firebombed

STOCKHOLM — The purification room of a Jewish cemetery in Malmo, Sweden was firebombed, but not destroyed, last month after a Magen David was painted on the city's central mosque.

CIC Expresses Optimism About 'Road Map'

OTTAWA — The head of the Canada-Israel Committee (CIC) expressed cautious optimism last week after the release of the U.S.-backed "road map" for Israeli-Palestinian peace.

"The CIC welcomes any opportunity to advance the cause of peace and reconciliation between Israelis and Palestinians and to provide genuine security for Israelis, who have been targeted by a relentless campaign of Palestinian terrorism over the past 33 months," CIC national chair Joseph Wilder said of the plan, which calls for the creation of a Palestinian state as part of ending the conflict by 2005.

The CIC is greeting the confirmation of incoming Palestinian Authority Prime Minister Mahmoud Abbas and his new cabinet "hopefully," Wilder said, adding the CIC remains "apprehensive" about PA president Yasser Arafat's influence over the cabinet and PA decision-making.

Wilder said the CIC is also concerned about Abbas' commitment to his pledge to disarm all terror groups and rein in terror attacks and anti-Israel incitement, which Wilder said have "consistently derailed the peace process."

Last week's suicide bombing in Tel Aviv, which killed three and injured 50, "underscores the urgency for [Abbas] to act decisively to stop such attacks. Otherwise no progress can be made in implementing the road-map," Wilder said.

Families sue government on behalf of autistic kids

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

Twenty-nine families went to Superior Court in Toronto last week to sue the provincial government on behalf of their autistic children, whose constitutional rights the parents say the province has violated.

Claim Ontario has violated constitutional rights

The families allege that the provincial government discriminates against children with autism by refusing to fund a therapy program for their youngsters when they reach the age of six. And, while the program is available for children between the ages of two and five, the parents claim that long waiting lists effectively shut many out of the program completely. The families are seeking $100 million in compensatory damages.

The therapy, known as applied behavioural analysis (ABA) or intensive behavioural intervention (IBI), is based on the 1987 work of University of California Los Angeles psychology professor O. Ivar Lovaas. He found that through the intensive use of rewards, children with autism can be taught to modify certain behaviours. Therapists, consultants, parents and educators work one-on-one with the children so that each child learns to master small skills a little bit at a time.

The therapy can cost up to $50,000 per year.

The parents want the province to provide IBI therapy for children with autism as they progress through their school system.

"Anything that other children do intuitively, autistic kids have to be taught," says Tammy Starr, whose eight-year-old daughter, Carly, has been participating in an ABA program at home for four years.

Starr says Carly, who is non-verbal, used to sit trancelike and withdrawn in her own world. Now she has learned to focus for longer periods of time and point on a communication board to items she wants.

For 2½ years, Carly attended Zareinu Educational Centre where specialized education is provided in a Jewish learning environment. However, because ABA is not currently provided by the school, the additional cost of a combined program made Jewish education financially prohibitive, Starr said, adding that a number of the parents involved in the lawsuit are Jewish.

Zareinu principal Carol Goldman said parents are referred to specialized consultants outside the centre. However, Zareinu is hoping to be able to provide ABA once the school has additional space.

From a child's inspiration

All parents know that we can never really "prepare" the roads that our children will one day travel. All we can do, with consistency and love, is to try to prepare our children for the various smooth and bumpy roads on which they will inevitably find themselves.

How we help to instil in them the self-confidence they will need to contend with all manner of roads, how we inspire our children to believe in themselves and in the high, rewarding purposes that await their discovery and courage, is the most important bequest we can impart to them.

A poignantly illuminating case in point is that of a Brooklyn barber who came to America by himself from Bessarabia at the age of 17. He built a life and a home there and for the three children he and his wife would eventually raise.

To celebrate the birthday of his youngest child, Susan, he took her to the Radio City Music Hall. That starry afternoon and magical moment with her father affected the future course of the young girl's life. That moment led to a lifetime of such moments. Eventually, music halls, stage and theatre became her life's work.

"I never wanted to do anything else," Susan Schulman told The CJN last week. "I was enthralled with theatre from then on. I wanted to construct an entire world on the stage and have it be perfectly enchanting."

Today, after some 20 years of making her living in theatre, Schulman is an accomplished, award-winning director. Her latest work will be seen at the Stratford Festival of Canada where she is directing Rodgers and Hammerstein's beloved play, The King and I. It is Schulman's third season at Stratford. She has also directed Fiddler on the Roof and Man of La Mancha at the festival.

But the list of her directorial achievements is extensive. To name but a few of the accomplishments on that list, Schulman recently directed the gala reunion of Violet; the Broadway, U.S. and Australian tours of The Sound of Music; and the national tour of Sunset Boulevard, Allegro, The Boys from Syracuse, and A Connecticut Yankee.

Schulman grew up in Brooklyn. But the theatres, museums, art galleries, symphonies and botanical gardens of Greater New York City were as much her classroom as were the rooms at her elementary and junior high school.

Art, music, drama and esthetics had taken deep root within her soul. A life in theatre would be its flower.

After junior high school, Schulman went to the High School for Performing Arts, the school immortalized in the movie Fame. After her famous high school, Schulman studied at Hofstra University and then at Yale where she acquired a master's degree in fine art.

Susan Schulman

A play on the scale of The King and I takes at least a year of preparation to put together, Schulman told The CJN. Planning for it began during last season.

"There was so much to research – Thai culture, dance, religion and even architecture. I did not want to be general about the setting of the play. I wanted it to be about Thailand specifically (Siam in the original play)."

The fact that the play – story and music – has virtually entered our folklore as a result of its popularity on broadway and in the cinema will have no bearing on Schulman's interpretation of the work.

"I always try to approach a play as if it had never been performed before," she said. "I try to impart to the audience my vision of the playwright's work."

The playwright of Anna and the King of Siam, on which The King and I was based, produced a work that has won wide appeal around the world. The story is well known to audiences and its messages are timeless.

"It is not about a hero and a villain, or good versus bad," Schulman notes. "It is about a clash of cultures in which two strong-willed individuals eventually learn a great deal from each other. At first, the king is unable to deal with Anna as a woman and as a person of equal intelligence, while she is unable to deal with the king in terms of his own culture." But their assumptions, and attitudes about each other, the members of the audience know even before they take their seat, eventually change.

Schulman does not view her role as that of a teacher. "I try to entertain an audience," she said. "I try to give the audience an opportunity to develop their own ideas. I am not here to preach."

Perhaps that modesty of purpose but purposefulness of method was one of the lessons Schulman absorbed from her father when she put her hand in his and the two of them went to Radio City for her birthday. For it was there, after all, that she developed the first stirrings about who she was, what she wanted to be and how she would contribute to the betterment of the world. More than a score of years later, we are all the beneficiaries.

The King and I opens at Stratford on May 27.

The event was held on Yom Hashoah, April 29, at Queen's Park. MPP Monte Kwinter, who attended the ceremony, and former MPP Charles Harnick were instrumental in having the province recognize Ontario citizens who survived the Holocaust. Last week's event was the 10th anniversary of such recognition ceremonies. Seen, from left, are Hank Rosenbaum, national chair of the Canadian Society for Yad Vashem; Premier Ernie Eves, who presented the certificates; Morris Gruda, one of the honorees; and Minister of Citizenship Carl De Faria.

Associated parents angry over 12% tuition hike

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Last week, about 30 parents signed and delivered a letter outlining their frustration over a 12 per cent increase in tuition at Associated Hebrew Day Schools.

The letter, which was addressed to Associated president Sheldon Carr, said that this increase was "especially disappointing because, after years of steady increases in tuition," parents were anticipating some relief in their financial burden as a result of the current Government of Ontario's Equity in Education Tax Credit.

They went on to state that they will not increase their payments for next year and will base their cheques on last year's tuition of $7,950, instead of on the new tuition of $9,000.

Wayne Levin, a parent of three Associated children and a signatory on the letter, said the increase was particularly disturbing because it creates uncertainty about the future direction of tuitions.

"If Jewish education is to mean anything, parents have to rely on stable and affordable tuitions," he said.

Otherwise, parents will learn to expect that putting their children in the Jewish education system means facing difficult and stressful decisions every year about whether they can remain in the school, Levin said, adding that this isn't something parents take into account when they begin the process.

Levin noted that this increase has created a stratification – the wealthy and the subsidized families don't seem to be affected by the increase. Those in the middle class are forced to remove their kids.

At these higher tuition levels, alternatives become more attractive. Families are discussing other ways to give their children Jewish education such as starting new smaller schools, using the public and supplementary school combination or providing Jewish education through summers spent in Israel, Levin said.

At this point, Levin said that parents want to open discussions with Associated and be included in deliberations about the role of Jewish education before fees are set.

Rabbi Moshe Stern, past president of the Va'ad HaRabanim and the current Shaarei Tefillah Synagogue rabbi, said that the increase in tuitions is inconsistent with the message rabbis are giving their communities.

> 'Without an increase in fees Associated will face a $1.3 million deficit in 2003/04'
>
> — Arthur Landa

On one hand, rabbis are telling the Jewish community to have more children because the 2001 census indicates that the Jewish population is declining. In addition, rabbis are emphasizing the importance of providing a Jewish education for every Jewish child, Rabbi Stern said.

However, families are saying that having more children will mean they won't be able to send any of their kids to Jewish schools, he said.

Other elementary Jewish day school tuitions can vary in price from $9,450 to $11,550.

Over the past few years, the situation in Israel has meant that UJA Federation's financial resources have been directed at providing relief in Israel and funds for Jewish schools in the diaspora have been frozen, Rabbi Stern said.

The community needs to recognize that this situation will have long-term adverse effects because many families are deciding not to begin Jewish education programs for their children.

It's possible that "the people on committees making these decisions don't understand what an increase in tuitions means to the middle class parent," Rabbi Stern suggested.

Associated president Sheldon Carr said that the school "raised fees to cover the tremendous operating expenses in the upgrading of the educational programs."

Arthur Landa, executive director of Associated, said that "without an increase in fees Associated will face a $1.3 million deficit in 2003/04."

"In retrospect, it is possible that the board of directors may not have increased tuitions enough in the past two years to cover costs.

"The board was hopeful it could maintain the lowest fees possible. However, raising tuitions for next year was deemed the only way possible to maintain financial integrity," he said.

Landa went on to say that "parents at Associated expect the highest quality education at a lower tuition than anyone else." In the near future Landa said that town hall meetings will be arranged so that parents and the school can get together to discuss their concerns.

Liberal rabbis back same-sex marriages

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

While the family is the primary vehicle for transmitting Jewish identity, families headed by same-sex partners are capable of fulfilling Jewish values, a coalition of liberal rabbis who support legalizing homosexual marriages has told the Ontario Court of Appeal.

The continued prohibition of same-sex marriages infringes on religious freedoms and equality rights of both clergy and member congregants, stated the Canadian Coalition of Liberal Rabbis for Same-Sex Marriage in its factum presented to the court late last month by their lawyer, Ed Morgan.

Jewish law 'not immutable'

In one of three legal cases in Canada challenging the traditional definition of marriage, the coalition told the court that marriage in the Jewish tradition is not centred solely on procreation.

Jewish law and interpretations are rooted in tradition, "but are not immutable. In liberal Judaism, religious traditions and understandings of social institutions such as marriage are open to interpretation in accordance with community values and individual morality," said the coalition of 25 Reform and Reconstructionist rabbis from across Canada, headed by Rabbi Irwin Zeplowitz of Temple Anshe Shalom in Hamilton.

"In fact, liberal Judaism represents a significant and growing constituency within the Jewish community that supports same-sex rights and freedom of choice for same-sex marriage."

The court was hearing an appeal of an Ontario Divisional Court ruling last July, which found the traditional definition of marriage as "the lawful and voluntary union of one man and one woman to the exclusion of all others" to be unconstitutional.

The federal, provincial and municipal governments appealed the lower court ruling. Included in the case are eight Ontario same-sex couples who have been denied marriage licenses by the City of Toronto.

In their support, the liberal rabbis said there is a broad range of views and interpretations within Judaism on the subject and "certainly no single spokesperson for Jewish law and its interpretation."

The rabbis took issue with an earlier submission by the Interfaith Coalition on Marriage and Family, a group of evangelical Protestants, Catholics, Muslims and Sikhs, who oppose any changes to the traditional definition of marriage.

The rabbis rejected the interfaith group's assessment that religious Jews in Canada view the prospect of the recognition of same-sex marriages as "destabilizing" to their religious freedoms.

"This concern is not shared by all religious Jews," stated the rabbinic coalition. "Judaism is far from monolithic, embracing substantial diversity in practices and interpretation," including the Reform movement, which endorses same-sex unions based on the discretion of individual rabbis.

(Earlier this year, the Conservative movement announced it is preparing to consider whether homosexuality is permissible according to Jewish law).

"The general trend outside the Orthodox community is toward a modernized reading of Jewish values that affirms the inherent dignity of all persons," the rabbinic group stated, saying it represents those "who view it as a religious duty to correct the misunderstandings and resulting injustices toward gays and lesbians, and to fulfil the Jewish obligation to seek justice.

"Support of gay and lesbian families helps to strengthen the Jewish family... and allows all community members to participate in the committed and loving relationships fostered by the Jewish faith."

The rabbis explained that Judaism has always been able to accommodate itself to the secular laws of modern nations, even when those laws contradict Halachah.

For example, the sale and consumption of non-kosher food in Canada is not seen as an attack on Jewish values. Neither is the fact that Canadian marriage laws permit the union of Jews and non-Jews.

Similarly, supporting same-sex marriage, whether in religious or civil ceremonies, "would not in any way infringe the rights of fellow Jews to withhold affirmation" of those marriages.

Changing the rules would not attack or undermine Orthodox Judaism, since its members would not be required to solemnize or recognize same-sex marriages if they chose not to, the rabbinic group argued.

However, "the current state-enforced prohibition of same-sex marriages prevents liberal Jews from acting in accordance with their conscience.

"Marriage holds a central place in the Jewish tradition, and it is natural that Jewish gays and lesbians would wish to be included in a sacrament that is at the heart of their religious belief and practice."

In the two other related cases, Quebec Superior Court last year also ruled that the legal definition of marriage is discriminatory and unconstitutional, while British Columbia's Court of Appeal last week endorsed the right of same-sex couples to marry and gave Ottawa until July 2004 to change existing marriage laws.

Officials say the cases will likely be combined and ultimately decided by the Supreme Court of Canada.

As well, the House of Commons' justice and human rights committee wrapped up hearings this month on whether and how same-sex marriages could be legally recognized.

A very great day

On the afternoon of the fifth day of Iyar, Friday, May 14, 1948, the leaders of the Yishuv in British Mandatory Palestine came together in the Tel Aviv museum to officially proclaim, before the whole world, the founding of the State of Israel.

Shabbat was approaching, but the men and women assembled in the stately chamber in the home of the first mayor of Tel Aviv, were actually greeting a new, shining dawn. And like each new morning after a long night of darkness, it was warm, radiant and beautiful.

One thousand eight hundred and 13 years after the defeat of Bar Kochba by the armies of the Roman Empire, a sovereign Jewish state had arisen once again in the constellation of nations.

The reading of the declaration of independence was carefully planned to take place as close to Shabbat as possible, for after sunset, at the stroke of midnight, the British mandatory administration would come to an end. British forces would leave the country. The nascent Jewish state would then be attacked from all directions by a hostile, hate-filled Arab world. Even as the Union Jack was lowered for the last time in Mandatory Palestine, the Egyptian air force began its bombing of the people of Tel Aviv. It was not the first time the Arabs of Palestine rejected any compromise with the Jews of Palestine; nor was it the first time the Arab world expressed its utter refusal to accept a sovereign Jewish presence in the Middle East.

The ceremony in the Tel Aviv museum was modest and swift. It was not publicized ahead of time out of fear that British authorities might try to make some last-minute mischief for the Jewish leaders of the country-about-to-born. But news of the event spread rapidly. Thousands of people poured into the streets of Tel Aviv. They carried the news of the founding of the state like a living current of electricity across neighbourhoods, cities, oceans and continents. In a mere instant of syncopating time, Jews all around the world rose in celebration and thanksgiving. Countless millions of friends who understood and supported the justice of the Jewish cause also sang songs of praise.

We who were born after 1948, trying to imagine 55 years later how the moment must have felt, are stopped by the inadequacy of our imaginations and the inability of our minds to travel to that single metaphysical moment where history met with longing, courage met with determination and the Jewish people returned to their Land.

Parents who can recall that moment should tell their children. Children should ask their grandparents so that all generations will understand what was achieved by a long-suffering people of very small numbers but very high purpose, on the fifth day of Iyar, in 1948. Let us too all celebrate Yom Ha'atzmaut, for it surely is a very great day.

Thank you God for granting us life, sustaining us and for bringing us to this day.

LET OUR PEOPLE GO...

Why I envy the Iraqi people

I envy the Iraqi people, because they have the United States on their side, the modern, colossal Robin Hood that takes from the rich and gives to the victimized poor.

When U.S. forces leave Iraq, her citizens will be wealthier, healthier and more politically empowered than ever before.

It is the dawning of a new era for Iraqis. Talk about good fortune.

And we Canadians, who rightly fear terrorism and separatism, now look like fools who backed the wrong horse and must now crawl on our hands and knees for forgiveness in order to repair the damage and avoid the consequences of no longer having the United States on our side.

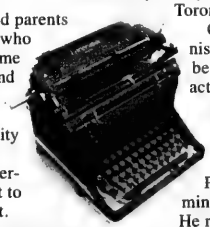
Should welcome interfaith families

As founder of InterfaithFamily.com, Inc., a non-profit company whose mission is to empower interfaith families to make Jewish choices and to encourage the Jewish community to welcome them, I offer a very different perspective from Rabbi Steven Saltzman ("Judaism must deny non-Jews shul membership to remain strong," CJN, Jan. 30, 2003).

Rabbi Saltzman's premise is that intermarried parents who say they are raising their children as Jews in fact have "dual-religion homes where Christianity and its practices are observed." He relies on the biased "Jewish and Something Else" study, which concluded that an intermarried family that honours its non-Jewish relatives by having a Christmas or Easter dinner with them is "incorporating substantial Christian elements."



However, the thousands of intermarried parents who write for and visit our Web site and who are raising Jewish children, while at the same time respecting their non-Jewish partners and their children's grandparents, experience these celebrations not as religious holidays, but as warm family times. The Jewish identity of the children is not compromised.

Contrary to Rabbi Saltzman's fears, interfaith families joining synagogues seek not to undermine Judaism, but to participate in it.

Nor need accepting intermarrieds as synagogue members undermine encouraging our children to in-marry. Children can be told that their chances of having a Jewish life and family are greatly increased if they marry other Jews — a statistical fact. But they can also have a Jewish life and family if they do intermarry, as InterfaithFamily.com's writers and readers attest.

I support "inreach," that is, building a dynamic core of Jewish families and a vision that will attract people to Jewish life. But many of the children of those core families will intermarry — and many of those who intermarry can be attracted to Jewish life.

Excluding them from synagogue life is a prescription for weakening, not strengthening, synagogues and the Jewish community.

Obsession must stop

Perhaps Jillian Clare Cohen asked Sheldon Kirshner to put these details in his story, but I think it's disgusting that a piece on medicine shortages in the world would contain the following sentence: "Cohen, 36 and single, believes she brings a different perspective on the role of governments and politics in pharmaceutical policy." ("Lack of basic medicines around the world concerns Cohen," CJN, April 25)

What does her being 36 and single have to do with her different perspective on the role of governments and politics in pharmaceutical policy?

The Jewish population is far too obsessed with knowing people's age and marital status, especially that of women. It has to stop somewhere.

Dreams can come true

Your editorial "Good Luck Mr. Charest" (CJN, April 25) and Jean Charest's election as the new premier of Quebec reminds me of an event 10 years ago at the Royal York Hotel sponsored by the Canadian Foundation of Physically Disabled Persons and the Rotary Club of Toronto Don Valley in aid of abused children.

Charest was the keynote speaker and reminisced about his student days and his dreams to become a lawyer – a lawyer like the TV character Perry Mason.

After the speech, I had the privilege, as the volunteer public relations and fundraising advisor, to meet Charest, and I asked him whether he thought his dreams of being a Perry Mason really meant being a prime minister in Canadian politics.

He roared with laughter and said, "Hey, I can do with you on my campaign team."

And now I wonder whether federal Liberal leadership frontrunner Paul Martin has similar dreams that go back to his student days – to be the future prime minister of Canada. Why not? He does have the right initials.

And as biblical Joseph proved, "Dreams do come true."

Perspectives

THE DECLARATION OF THE ESTABLISHMENT OF THE STATE OF ISRAEL

To commemorate the 55th anniversary of the founding of the State of Israel, we publish its Declaration of Independence. We have published this document on previous occasions, but it is worthwhile and important that we do again.

On May 14, 1948, the day on which the British Mandate over Palestine expired, the Jewish People's Council gathered at the Tel Aviv Museum and approved the following proclamation. The new state was recognized that night by the United States and three days later by the USSR.

Eretz Yisrael was the birthplace of the Jewish people. Here their spiritual, religious and political identity was shaped. Here they first attained statehood, created cultural values of national and universal significance and gave to the world the eternal Book of Books.

After being forcibly exiled from their land, the people kept faith with it throughout their dispersion and never ceased to pray and hope for their return to it and for the restoration in it of their political freedom.

Impelled by this historic and traditional attachment, Jews strove in every successive generation to re-establish themselves in their ancient homeland. In recent decades they returned in their masses. Pioneers and defenders, they made deserts bloom, revived the Hebrew language, built villages and towns, and created a thriving community controlling its own economy and culture, loving peace but knowing how to defend itself, bringing the blessings of progress to all the country's inhabitants, and aspiring towards independent nationhood.

In the year 5657 (1897), at the summons of the spiritual father of the Jewish State, Theodore Herzl, the First Zionist Congress convened and proclaimed the right of the Jewish people to national rebirth in its own country.

This right was recognized in the Balfour Declaration of the 2nd November, 1917, and re-affirmed in the Mandate of the League of Nations which, in particular, gave international sanction to the historic connection between the Jewish people and Eretz Yisrael and to the right of the Jewish people to rebuild its national home.

The catastrophe which recently befell the Jewish people – the massacre of millions of Jews in Europe – was another clear demonstration of the urgency of solving the problem of its homelessness by re-establishing the Jewish State in Eretz Yisrael, which would open the gates of the homeland wide to every Jew and confer upon the Jewish people the status of a fully privileged member of the comity of nations.

Survivors of the Nazi Holocaust in Europe, as well as Jews from other parts of the world, continued to migrate to Eretz Yisrael, undaunted by difficulties, restrictions and dangers, and never ceased to assert their right to a life of dignity, freedom and honest toil in their national homeland.

In the Second World War, the Jewish community of this country contributed its full share to the struggle of the freedom– and peace-loving nations against the forces of Nazi wickedness and, by the blood of its soldiers and its war effort, gained the right to be reckoned among the peoples who founded the United Nations.

On the 29th November, 1947, the United Nations General Assembly passed a resolution calling for the establishment of a Jewish State in Eretz Yisrael; the General Assembly required the inhabitants of Eretz Yisrael to take such steps as were necessary on their part for the implementation of that resolution. This recognition by the United Nations of the right of the Jewish people to establish their state is irrevocable.

Accordingly we, members of the People's Council, representatives of the Jewish community of Eretz Yisrael and of the Zionist movement, are here assembled on the day of the termination of the British Mandate over Eretz Yisrael and, by virtue of our natural and historic right and on the strength of the resolution of the United Nations General Assembly, hereby declare the establishment of a Jewish State in Eretz Yisrael, to be known as the State of Israel.

WE DECLARE that, with effect from the moment of the termination of the Mandate being tonight, the eve of Sabbath, the 6th Iyar, 5708 (15th May, 1948), until the establishment of the elected, regular authorities of the State in accordance with the Constitution which shall be adopted by the Elected Constituent Assembly no later than the 1st October 1948, the People's Council shall act as a Provisional Council of State, and its executive organ, the People's Administration, shall be the Provisional Government of the Jewish State, to be called "Israel."

THE STATE OF ISRAEL will be open for Jewish immigration and for the Ingathering of the Exiles; it will foster the development of the country for the benefit of all its inhabitants; it will be based on freedom, justice and peace as envisaged by the prophets of Israel; it will ensure complete equality of social and political rights to all its inhabitants irrespective of religion, race or sex; it will guarantee freedom of religion, conscience, language, education and culture; it will safeguard the holy places of all religions; and it will be faithful to the principles of the Charter of the United Nations.

THE STATE OF ISRAEL is prepared to co-operate with the agencies and representatives of the United Nations in implementing the resolution of the General Assembly of the 29th November, 1947, and will take steps to bring about the economic union of the whole of Eretz Yisrael.

WE APPEAL to the United Nations to assist the Jewish people in the building-up of its State and to receive the State of Israel into the comity of nations.

WE APPEAL – in the very midst of the onslaught launched against us now for months – to the Arab inhabitants of the State of Israel to preserve peace and participate in the building of the State on the basis of full and equal citizenship and due representation in all its provisional and permanent institutions.

WE EXTEND our hand to all neighbouring states and their peoples in an offer of peace and good neighbourliness, and appeal to them to establish bonds of co-operation and mutual help with the sovereign Jewish people settled in its own land. The State of Israel is prepared to do its share in a common effort for the advancement of the entire Middle East.

WE APPEAL to the Jewish people throughout the Diaspora to rally round the Jews of Eretz Yisrael in the tasks of immigration and upbuilding and to stand by them in the great struggle for the realization of the age-old dream – the redemption of Israel.

Placing our trust in the Almighty, we affix our signatures to this proclamation at this session of the Provisional Council of State, on the soil of the homeland, in the city of Tel Aviv, on this Sabbath eve, the 5th day of Iyar, 5708 (14th May, 1948).

There may be holes in the 'road map'

A workable formula for peaceful co-existence between Israelis and Palestinians continues to be elusive. The Oslo accords, having promised much, delivered little, while their touted alternative, the Saudi peace plan, was essentially a non-starter. Meanwhile, instead of looking toward a framework for reducing tensions, there exists on both sides of the conflict a pervasive climate of deep mistrust that crosses generations and affects most aspects of daily life.

Lawrence Hart in Hamilton

Given this reality, it would seem the time is right for an end to hostilities and the resumption of a diplomatic process of some kind. Indeed, there seems to be renewed enthusiasm for the the "road map" that U.S. President George W. Bush first outlined last June, and which is also sponsored by the other members of the so-called "quartet," Russia, the European Union and the United Nations.

Whether it has any chance of success remains to be seen, but for sceptics there is more than ample cause for concern that the road map will yield little more than the peace plans that preceded it. For in the cauldron of Mideast politics, even the most generous proposals have been scuttled because the sides were far apart on fundamental issues.

What has also tended to occur is that the brokers of peace have become motivated more by their own interests than by the broader goals they're meant to be pursuing. And within the current context, the assumption that the members of the quartet are even reading from the same page needs to be seriously questioned.

Having so stridently parted ways in their attitudes towards military action in Iraq, how conceivable is it that the United States will suddenly find common cause with Russia, the EU, and the UN on the often delicate nuances of the Israeli-Palestinian relationship? In fact, it would not be too surprising if the dynamic among these unlikely allies itself becomes a problematic sidebar to the overall process.

However, an obviously more important issue relates to whether a workable interaction will begin to develop between Israelis and Palestinians themselves. A preliminary version of the road map describes it as "performance-based and goal-driven," with clearly defined phases, timelines, target dates and benchmarks.

Unqualified compliance will be required if such a description is to translate into positive action – and a climate of goodwill and co-operation will certainly need to emerge for this to happen.

But first and foremost, an immediate end to terrorism and anti-Israel incitement will have to be enforced and be seen to be sustainable. Otherwise, this initiative, like others before it, will be doomed to failure, even before the substantive issues of territory, normalization and recognition can be meaningfully addressed.

Dear Mayor...

Early next month, residents of Jerusalem will elect the city's next mayor. According to the latest polls, millionaire businessman Nir Barkat, a 43-year-old political unknown and electoral virgin, is the frontrunner. His chances of winning, however, now depend on the city's large haredi population, who may still put forward their own candidate. In February Ehud Olmert, who had been mayor since 1993, stepped down to become a cabinet minister in the new government of Prime Minister Ariel Sharon.

Robert Sarner in Jerusalem

A Jerusalem mayor faces challenges unlike anywhere else, if for no other reason that for billions of Jews, Christians and Muslims around the world, Jerusalem is sacred. It exists powerfully in their religious beliefs, spiritual imagination and conflicting claims on the Holy City. For these people, Jerusalem's ancient history is vital stuff. For the city's residents, the past is all well and good, but it's the here and now they want the mayor to improve.

Given the complexity of Jerusalem, the new mayor will need all the help he can get. To that end, I've prepared the following "To Do" list to keep the mayor on track. True, it's also a bit of a personal wish-list, but one with the better interests of the capital in mind. These 20 suggestions are just for starters. There are lots more where they came from.

Downtown down for the count? – Bring the city centre back to life. It desperately needs animation, commerce and a sense of style. Only major innovation will do the trick.

Heavy breathing – Time to tackle Jerusalem's sadly overlooked scourge of air pollution.

Urban refuge – Parks don't add to the city coffers, but they sure make life better. Jerusalem is sorely lacking in green places for solace from traffic, concrete and stone.

The other side of town – Providing decent services (including building permits) and improving the long-neglected infrastructure of Arab neighbourhoods won't turn its residents into Zionists, but it will help ease tensions in the city.

Open for business – Without attracting investment, stimulating the local economy and creating jobs, the city is doomed.

Gushing forth – A land-locked metropolis needs the soothing effect that only water can bring. Fountains are the perfect solution, the bigger the better to also make them attractive landmarks.

No Parking – Underground multi-level parking garages needed urgently throughout the city.

Ouch! – Outrageously high local taxes (arnona) are making living in Jerusalem increasingly prohibitive, contributing to many young residents leaving the city.

Learning the hard way – The education facilities and class-sizes in local schools (especially the secular ones) are a scandal.

Get out there and mix – As mayor, make contact with the people, get to know the city intimately and its residents. Be a mensch, a character that inspires.

Sleaze alert – Cleaning up the widespread corruption and waste at City Hall is long overdue. No need to say more.

Colour our city – Beautify the urban backdrop with public art, murals, posters, sculptures, etc., and in the process support local artists.

On the rails – Pressure the government and Knesset to finally make a high-speed train connection with Tel Aviv and Ben-Gurion Airport a national priority.

Friendly wheels – Encourage city cyclists with a network of bike paths and special lanes reserved for bicycles.

The call of the Zamboni – If Metulla can host one, why can't Jerusalem have its own ice skating/hockey rink? OK, I admit my personal considerations are showing here.

Fare play – To reduce the number of cars in Jerusalem, cancel bus fares. The dividends from less traffic will far outweigh the costs.

The Jerusalem Forest – Save what's left of it.

Feet first – Return the sidewalks to what they were intended for: pedestrians, not parked cars.

Make a splash – The city's precious few swimming pools all are guilty of shameless price gouging. If we can't have a beach, at least build affordable alternatives.

Lighten up – Let your imagination run wild. Introduce a sense of fun, humour and playfulness to life in the city that takes itself far too seriously.

A tall order? Yes, but nothing that good creative thinking, effective fund-raising, political coercion and hard work can't solve. No one said governing Jerusalem was going to be a cakewalk. Getting elected was the easy part. Proving you deserved the job is much tougher.

Wishing you lots of success.

Well-intentioned support for Israel-bashers

The primary threats to Israel's survival do not come from Iran's weapons of mass destruction or from Palestinian terrorists. Rather, the deeper danger comes from the continuing propaganda campaign that rejects Israel's legitimacy and seeks to roll back the UN partition plan of November 1947.

Gerald Steinberg in Jerusalem

This is the same campaign that produced the infamous UN resolution of 1975, which equated Zionism with racism and which was revived at the 2002 United Nations anti-racism conference in Durban, South Africa. The Israel-bashers have shifted the focus away from the Palestinian responsibility for terrorism and the failure of the Oslo process, while promoting the great lies of massive human rights violations by Israel.

While Arab and Islamic organizations lead the way, such Israel-bashing is promoted by that other axis of evil – journalists, diplomats (including the United Nations), academics and self-proclaimed universal human rights groups. These non-governmental organizations (NGOs) enjoy a halo effect, and an image of promoting noble causes without political bias exempts them from scrutiny. They are also extremely influential, and their reports are quoted extensively. In reality, however, these NGOs are at the very core of the anti-Israel axis of evil. By promoting the campaign of hatred and delegitimization, such groups are morally guilty of justifying terrorism.

Charges of Israeli war crimes, violations of international law and systematic human rights abuses are commonplace in the reports and press releases of NGOs such as Amnesty International, OXFAM, Christian Aid and Human Rights Watch. These reports generally rely on information supplied by Palestinians and their political or ideological supporters (often employed by the NGOs or UN agencies with whom they are in close contact), and the claims are rarely subject to independent confirmation.

In addition, dozens of Israeli-based and Palestinian groups receive massive funding from abroad to produce a steady stream of anti-Israel political propaganda that has nothing to do with human rights. As documented in the analyses of the B'nai Brith's NGO Monitor, lies and distortions are reported by journalists, repeated by diplomats and in UN publications, cited in academic journals and then appear on NGO Web sites.

In this propaganda war, it is surprising that some of the NGOs and their ignoble activities are funded by Jewish and Israel-oriented organizations such as the New Israel Fund. The most notorious example – Physicians for Human Rights Israel (PHR-I), emphasizes illegal Israeli occupation, and uses the medical dimension as a thin cover to promote its ideological agenda. PHR-I's crude propaganda is seen by many as anti-Semitic, and has prompted the Israeli Medical Association to end all co-operation with this group. The cartoons published by PHR-I, including an eight-page pamphlet circulated in English and Hebrew last fall in Ha'aretz, use stereotypes of Palestinian victims and Israeli oppressors, with no mention of brutal suicide attacks.

The NIF also funds the Nazareth-based Arab Association of Human Rights (known as HRA) and Adalah. Rather than working primarily to encourage values such as equality and tolerance among Israeli citizens, both Jewish and Arab, and delegitimize terrorism, these groups are at the forefront of the externally directed campaign to distort the Israeli reality.

Under the cover of human and civil rights, both groups promote blatant ideological and political agendas anchored in the delegitimization of Israel as a Jewish and democratic state. In its press review, HRA consistently condemns Israeli actions to prevent terrorist attacks. Vital security measures are misleadingly labelled as evidence of discrimination, while facts that do not support this false charge are ignored. Similarly, Adalah has played a leading role in the promoting the myth that Israel is not a democracy.

Such objectives are not part of the NIF's stated goals, but the results undermine its claim to provide an alternative approach in support of Israeli democracy and Zionism. Many Israelis associate this organization primarily with the propaganda campaigns and funding for extremist fringe groups, while NIF's more positive activities are lost in the noise. A number of NIF supporters and officials have resigned following these revelations, and others are demanding a thorough accounting and change in policy. Given the important contributions that NIF makes in other areas, an immediate end to involvement in Israel-bashing disguised as support for human and civil rights could not come too quickly.

A fresh start or another dead end? This was the conundrum last week as the first Palestinian Authority prime minister, Mahmoud Abbas (Abu Mazen), took office and a new internationally sponsored blueprint for peace – the road map – was unveiled.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Appointed by PA President Yasser Arafat under the harsh glare of international pressure, Abbas called for "lasting peace," denounced terrorism and pledged to rein in radical groups tolerated by Arafat.

In setting out his agenda, Abbas raised expectations that his ascendancy may bring about a fundamental shift in Palestinian policy from terrorism to diplomacy, restore mutual trust, and lead Israel and the Palestinians back to the negotiating table after 31 months of futile fighting.

But within hours of Abbas' confirmation, a suicide bomber – a British national affiliated with Hamas– killed three Israelis in Tel Aviv, and an Israeli armoured force struck the Gaza Strip, killing 12 Palestinians.

The suicide bombing, the 91st since the eruption of the Palestinian uprising in September 2000 and the first of its kind carried out by a foreigner, raised Israel's death toll to 737 civilians and soldiers.

The Israeli raid into Gaza brought to 2,029 the number of Palestinians killed during this period.

The latest suicide bombing, the fifth this year, was a familiar tactic by Palestinians who cannot abide Israel's existence and pounce whenever peace beckons. Throughout the Oslo process, which crumbled with the outbreak of the second intifadah, Palestinian radicals constantly stoked the fires of rejection. The spiralling violence, and the perception that Arafat had little or no interest in curbing it, dampened support in Israel for a rapprochement with the Palestinians and led to the rise of Ariel Sharon as Israel's prime minister.

As part of a growing internal debate within the Palestinian community about the usefulness of violence to further its political objectives, Abbas cast grave doubt on the military option. Similarly, in his inaugural speech on April 29, he said he was convinced that terrorism does not "lend support to a just cause like ours, but rather destroys it."

In the power-sharing arrangement to which Arafat grudgingly agreed but which Hamas and Islamic Jihad quickly rejected, Abbas will have overall control of policing and internal security matters. His deputy, Mohammed Dahlan, will be in charge of crushing Islamic and secular forces that oppose an agreement with Israel. Yet it remains to be seen whether the Abbas/Dahlan team, backed by Israel and the United States, will try to squelch terrorism. In any case, Shin Bet, Israel's internal intelligence agency, doubts whether Abbas has the guts to confront terrorists. Like Arafat, he may fear that a concerted crackdown will precipitate a Palestinian civil war.

But the United States, acting on the assumption that Abbas' formal installation as prime minister may signal a new era in Palestinian politics, appears to have no such qualms.

In line with its view that the much-battered peace process can be revived now that Arafat has been partially sidelined and Saddam Hussein of Iraq has been deposed, the Bush administration has officially unveiled the road map – the three-pronged peace plan under the sponsorship of the Quartet: the United States, the United Nations, the European Union and Russia. The road map, a virtual facsimile of the Oslo accords, supplants the Mitchell proposals, which petered out in 2002. The seven-page document calls for reciprocal concessions and a two-state solution. Israel and the PA have in principle accepted the road map.

During phase one, the PA is obligated to fight terrorism, end violence, comply with a ceasefire and continue with its program of political and economic reforms. Israel must progressively withdraw from Palestinian autonomous areas in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip it reoccupied after the intifadah, dismantle outposts in the territories established since March 2001, and freeze all settlement activity. In tandem, Israel and the PA must resume security co-operation on the basis of a work plan submitted by George Tenet, director of the U.S. Central Intelligence Agency, in 2001.

The second stage envisages new Palestinian elections, the formation of a provisional Palestinian state, the passage of a Palestinian constitution, "further action" on Israeli settlements and a restoration of Arab ties with Israel. Permanent status issues – from final borders and Palestinian refugees to normal Israeli relations with the Arab world – are to be discussed in the third stage, which culminates in 2005.

Washington describes the road map as "a set document" not open to negotiation. But U.S. Secretary of State Colin Powell, who is scheduled to visit Israel on May 8 for further discussions, claims it will not be imposed.

The Palestinians are satisfied with its contents. "We accept it in total without reservations," said Nabil Shaath, the PA's foreign minister, last week. They believe that the Quartet basically supports their quest for a viable state, with its capital in eastern Jerusalem (annexed by Israel in 1967).

Israel, however, has raised at least 15 objections. It is uneasy about curbs on settlement construction, the establishment of a Palestinian state by 2005 and international supervision of the road map's implementation. Last autumn, shortly before a draft version was released, Sharon declared that a fullfledged settlement freeze would be unacceptable. Since then, Dov Weisglass, Sharon's chief of staff, and Silvan Shalom, who replaced Benjamin Netanyahu as foreign minister in a surprising cabinet shuffle, have insisted on further revisions.

Mahmoud Abbas

First and foremost, Israel insists that the Palestinians must abandon their demand for the "right of return" of refugees to their former homes in what is now Israel. Beyond this issue, Sharon wants to drop all references to Saudi Arabia's 2002 peace plan, which is contingent on a complete Israeli withdrawal to the pre-1967 lines; to place limits on Palestinian sovereignty, and to tighten up language on the dismantlement of Palestinian militias.

Another vexing problem that bothers Sharon is timing, whether Israel and the PA should make their respective concessions simultaneously or in sequence. Israel's position is that each stage should be completed in full before the next one is undertaken. In addition, Israel does not want the process linked to a rigid timetable, and refuses to enter into talks until terrorism ends. The Palestinians prefer the current parallellism of the road map.

As Defence Minister Shaul Mofaz has indicated, Israel is prepared to make goodwill gestures, provided the PA combats terrorism, dismantles terrorist organizations, collects illegal weapons and halts incitement in Palestinian institutions, mainly the media and schools. If these steps are taken, Israel is reportedly ready to improve the abysmal humanitarian situation, cede reoccupied land, release Palestinian prisoners and evacuate illegal outposts in the West Bank.

Sharon, who has spoken of his willingness to make "painful concessions" as the price for peace, has sounded conciliatory of late. In a statement that could have been attributed to the Israeli left, he observed: "I do not think we should rule over another people and run their lives." The occupation, he added, raises ethical and economic problems. And in a reference to the West Bank settlements of Shilo and Bet El, Sharon noted, "I know we will have to part with some of these places."

These remarks, though, are inconsistent with his apparent belief that Israel should keep more than half the West Bank, many of the settlements and the whole of Jerusalem.

Sharon's room for flexibility is also hampered by his far-right coalition partners, the National Union and the National Religious Party, both of which reject the land-for-peace formula and regard the road map as untenable. They will doubtless leave the government should Sharon embrace the road map in more or less its present form. If this scenario materializes, Sharon will invite the Labor party into his government.

It is already clear, regardless of whether the road map ultimately becomes the departure point for a renewed peace process, that it could have not been launched without the ouster of the Baathist regime in Iraq. On April 13, Sharon himself agreed that the Iraqi war had set into motion "the prospect of great changes" in the Middle East.

Two months before the American invasion of Iraq, Paul Wolfowitz, the U.S. deputy secretary of defence, commented that Washington's stake in an Arab-Israeli accord would intensify in the wake of such a war – an appraisal seconded by President George W. Bush. After U.S. Marines captured Baghdad, Wolfowitz elaborated on this theme, saying that Saddam's fall would improve "the atmosphere for negotiations" between Israel and the Palestinians.

It may be true. Just as the 1991 Gulf War paved the way for the Madrid conference, which in turn spawned the Oslo agreements, so the American military campaign in Iraq may yet have an historic impact on Israel's relationship with the Palestinians and the rest of its Arab neighbours.

She is a child survivor of the Holocaust. Each day she teaches her Grade 1 class to read and write Hebrew, and how to pray. Once a year, on the Remembrance Day for Yom HaShoah, she visits other classrooms, telling her story to as many children as she can. She doesn't mind if the children see her cry. "The only answer to the Holocaust is giving children a wonderful Jewish education," she says. Teachers speak to the younger children in their classrooms, and the other children attend a Yom HaShoah assembly. Each child receives a memorial candle to light at home. We must all remember.

Resistance and hope recurring themes

By JENNIFER M. PAQUETTE
Special to The CJN

Yiddish songs of resistance mingled with the fiercely optimistic voices of teenagers in Toronto's annual Holocaust commemoration, held last week at Earl Bales Park.

Yom Hashoah 5763

Titled "Yom Hashoah v'Hagvurah," usually translated as "Holocaust and Heroes Day," the event's emphasis was on heroism past, present and future.

Israeli consul general Meir Romem called the Shoah "the most atrocious crime committed by human beings in world history," and he spoke of modern-day anti-Semitism "not only in Europe or the Arab world, but in this great country."

Following his brief talk, Romem presented a Yad Vashem medal to the son of righteous gentile Laszlo Antal Benyei. Benyei's son, Andrew, and widow, Eva, also participated in lighting the last of six memorial candles in memory of the six million Jewish victims of the Shoah. Other candles were dedicated in memory of the 1.5 million murdered children and in honour of the partisans, resistance fighters and Allied forces.

Resistance was a recurring theme, as the gathered crowd of more than 2,000 people sang Ani Ma'amin and Zog Nit Keynmol, and a group of NCSY and Hillel students read out the final letter of 23-year-old Mordecai Anielewicz, commander of the Warsaw Ghetto uprising, which took place 60 years ago this month.

Following the reading by Ethel Cooper of an emotional poem about Pesach in the Ghetto, survivor Nachemia Wurman rose to share his story.

Just a teenager when he was taken by the Nazis to a slave labour camp, Wurman managed to escape, going without food for five days. After joining a partisan group in the forest, he managed to infiltrate the German 72nd infantry battalion – by masquerading as a Polish-German army volunteer.

Wurman spoke of catching a glimpse of himself in a mirror and wondering if he was dreaming.

"A Jewish boy in the uniform of Hitler's beasts?" he wondered, saying that, sometimes, "the best hiding place is in the mouth of the wolf." His job was to turn battalion passwords over to his partisan group, which led to numerous acts of sabotage.

Eventually, faced with the approaching Russian army, the battalion retreated and Wurman fled to the front lines, where he was captured by Russian soldiers, one of whom interrogated him. "Luckily," he said, "it was a Jewish Russian officer." Discovering that Wurman was a partisan, he released him and Wurman returned to his home town to search for any remaining Jews.

Wandering through the town centre, once vibrant with Jewish life, Wurman saw only a single woman, mumbling to herself in Yiddish. Drawing closer, he overheard her words: "If only I knew where Nachemia's grave is."

"That was my first encounter with a survivor," he said, "and it was my sister."

He learned that his sister had escaped from the slave labour camp the same day he had, and that she had been serving with a partisan unit in the forest. A brother also fought as a partisan.

Reading about the Holocaust, one story at a time

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

In A Blessing in Disguise, a short dramatic excerpt in the book Tapestry of Hope, Prime Minister William Lyon Mackenzie King's Quebec lieutenant, Ernest Lapointe, warns the prime minister that the people of Quebec are against Jewish immigration.

The excerpt is taken from the play None is Too Many by Jason Sherman and based on the book of the same name by Irving Abella and Harold Troper. It is November 1938.

Lapointe says Quebec "Premier [Maurice] Duplessis will use the refugees [from Nazi Europe] as props in his little morality play," and suggests that "for every refugee that sets foot on Quebec soil, there will be 100,000 lost votes for the Liberal party" in Quebec and the rest of Canada.

One wonders how often the federal government today still weighs the outcome of its decisions against the possible consequences of a provincial election.

Tapestry of Hope (Tundra Books) is a collection of published works of poetry, prose and drama for young readers filled with moments of discovery about the realities of the Holocaust. The collection, put together by Lillian Boraks-Nemetz and Irene N. Watts, gathers firsthand accounts by survivors, and literary observations by Jewish writers about the many different aspects of the war.

Included in the collection are stories about those who hid from the Nazis, accounts of fighting in the resistance and descriptions of life and death in the concentration camps. Each chapter is short and stands on its own.

The book faces a difficult task, balancing the goal of portraying stories about the Holocaust for young readers – recommended age is 11 and up – without overwhelming the audience. The editors attempt to reconcile this challenge by presenting short accounts that approach this complex historical period from different perspectives. While young readers may find it too demanding to read the book in its entirety at one sitting, they will probably feel compelled to eventually finish all the stories because each one is so different. Many are also relevant to current political trends and events.

Leonard Cohen's poem, All there is to know about Adolph Eichmann, helps to define the importance of the book for students and underscores how difficult it is to see when shades of grey turn black. After describing the outside appearance of Adolph Eichmann, Cohen asks, "What did you expect? Talons? Oversize incisors? Green saliva?"

Mordecai Richler's story The Holocaust and After touches on the current trend to soften the Holocaust by redefining history. In a 1963 trip to Germany, Richler describes how a young Canadian boy tells him that Adolf Hitler had to exterminate the Jews in Dachau because the Jews were against him.

Some people argue that focusing on the Holocaust reinforces the image of Jew as victim, a notion that is painful and difficult for many survivors. Others suggest that writing about that era trivializes the horrors experienced by the victims.

However, ignoring that period of history facilitates a world where the newly elected Palestinian Prime Minister Mahmoud Abbas can be considered a moderate by many world leaders, even though the topic of his doctoral dissertation is Holocaust denial.

'Israel is our response to all our enemies'

He died three hours before the liberation. Another brother and their parents also died in the Shoah.

Wurman's message for the next generation was one of defiance and pride: "Not all the Jews went to the slaughter like sheep," he said. "Many resisted and died in battle against the Nazis."

Survivors and their famillies light the six memorial candles.

The painting was particularly poignant for Ramon, as his mother is an Auschwitz survivor who later settled in Israel.

In his talk, Romem drew parallels between Jewish resistance during the Shoah and modern forms of resistance against anti-Semitism, including visiting Israel and making aliyah. "The whole country is inspiring," he said.

Calling Israel a "pioneer in the war against terrorism," Romem said "Israel is our response to all our enemies. They all try to exterminate the Jewish people, but the Jewish people will exist forever… Israel will exist forever."

Megillat Hashoah writer takes part in scroll reading

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

The author of Megillat Hashoah: The Shoah Scroll takes no credit for the elegantly written, moving Hebrew text that was read here on Yom Hashoah last week to commemorate victims of the Holocaust.

"It was written through me, at least the first draft, in less than six hours," said Avigdor Shinan, a professor of Hebrew literature at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem.

Yom Hashoah 5763

Speaking as part of a Yom Hashoah commemoration ceremony at Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am Congregation, Shinan, who was born in Prague in 1947, said he dedicated the scroll to his parents' families who perished in the Holocaust.

As a teenager during the war crimes trial of Adolf Eichmann in the early 1960s, Shinan "felt for the first time part of this suffering nation," but he said it took 40 years for those feelings to crystallize into the recently written text.

The scroll, a joint project of the Conservative movement's Rabbinical Assembly and the Schechter Institute of Jewish Studies in Jerusalem, was translated into English by New York liturgist Rabbi Jules Harlow.

Beth David member Alex Eisen, a Holocaust survivor, was the driving force behind the project. Rabbi Philip Scheim, the congregation's spiritual leader, joined Eisen in taking the idea to the Rabbinical Assembly in 2000.

The key to Jewish survival, said Rabbi Scheim, "has no doubt been the determination of Jews of every generation to ensure there would always be new generations who would study and transmit our sacred texts." The new scroll brings to Jewish ritual events of the Holocaust "that we can never allow the world to forget," he added.

"Unfortunately, some people have forgotten," said Israel's consul general, Meir Romem. "We all have to fight to make this planet a better place for all people."

Although the scroll was dedicated at Beth David last November as part of Holocaust Education Week, it was published only recently and was read this year in synagogues and public gatherings around the world, according to a press release from the Schechter Institute.

In Toronto, he read from the first chapter of six, each commemorating one million of the Jews who perished. The question "Why?" is asked in each chapter, said Shinan, but no answer is offered. All answers would "do an injustice or border on blasphemy," he said.

Other participants in the program included Cantors Aaron Bensoussan, Marshall Loomer, Louis Danto and Benjamin Maissner, Rabbis Lawrence Pinsker and Howard Morrison, as well as Paul Kochberg, president of United Synagogue Canadian Region, and the Renanim Vocal Youth Ensemble directed by Susan Michaels.

Holocaust survivors and their families were among those who lit memorial candles.

Excerpts from Megillat Hashoah

At first I still asked "Why?" Why me? Why us? Why now? But I stopped asking. The question is more painful when there is no answer.

Tonight they will take all of us to another location. This is what the Kapo told us, and she did not add another word, but her face was gloomy. I am writing all of this on scraps of paper. 71 year old Toronto woman loses 20 pounds!

Yippee!! I made it!!! I actually lost 20 pounds — and all because I saw an ad in the paper. After years of yo-yo dieting I have conquered my bad habits and now fit nicely into a size 8. I feel this is a huge accomplishment for someone who is 71 years old.

I must say that I have always been distrustful of hypnosis and never believed in it. However, I did not know anything about it. Because I was so desperate, I felt this was my last resort. I've tried everything else over my lifetime: shots, diet pills, liquids, and so on. I suffered with all of them, and in a matter of six months the weight returned and then some.

Dieting is no good. Hypnosis encourages you to eat properly and you never feel hungry. All cravings are gone. I exercise almost every day, not because I have to but because I am motivated and enjoy it. I love my new thin figure (size 8) and I'm full of energy.

Before I complete this unsolicited testimonial, I must mention another benefit from learning self-hypnosis through my program. My problem was not being able to sleep nights without taking sleeping pills. During the process of hypnosis I have learned to relax, so much so that now I am able to fall asleep in the most comfortable relaxed state, without medication. I could go on and on praising the qualities and benefits of hypnosis.

Thank you, Positive Changes !!!

Warsaw fighters recalled at shul ceremony

By ADAM SEGAL
Special to The CJN

Mourning and remembrance were central to a Yom Hashoah ceremony at Shaarei Tefillah Synagogue last week, but it was also an occasion to reflect on the courage of those who took part in the Warsaw Ghetto uprising and a forum to pay tribute to the heroism of the Jewish people.

"The Warsaw Ghetto uprising gave courage and inspiration to underground fighters everywhere," Prof. Adam Fuerstenberg of the Holocaust Centre of Toronto told a large crowd at the shul.

Yom Hashoah 5763

"Fighters tried to protect and save as many non-combatants as they could. Yet for themselves, they only asked for a weapon and a chance to avenge [the murder] of their families."

Fuerstenberg recalled that the Nazis entered the Warsaw Ghetto on the first day of Passover 60 years ago to round up what was supposed to be the last transport of Jews to death camps.

"Imagine the German surprise when they were met with Molotov cocktails... and bullets," Fuerstenberg said.

The ghetto was eventually set ablaze by the Nazis. Fuerstenberg quoted an uprising leader who described the fighters as dying "an honourable death, as befits an ancient and heroic people."

The ceremony, sponsored by the Canadian Holocaust Remembrance Association (CHRA), included the Associated Hebrew Day Schools choir, which sang several songs including Es Brent, Ani Maamin and Milchama Ha'Achrona.

Several memorial candles were also lit.

Shaarei Tefillah's Rabbi Moshe Stern also trumpeted the theme of Jewish courage and heroism, but not the kind demonstrated in battle. Rather, he spoke of the courage Jews have shown by rebuilding Jewish life after destruction.

He recalled how after 24,000 Jewish scholars under the tutelage of Rabbi Akiva died 2,000 years ago, the rabbi chose to re-establish a yeshiva.

"This was unbelievable fortitude and courage... to rebuild the hope of the Jewish people," Rabbi Stern said. "He was able to see good even in the negative."

Rabbi Stern noted that the presence of the children's choir at last week's event symbolized that Jewish life has indeed been rebuilt and will continue.

While speakers noted that the disturbing resurgence in anti-Semitism hung over this year's Yom Hashoah observances, all mentioned that the existence of a strong State of Israel is vital for the well-being of the Jewish people.

"Today we are fortunate to have our own country," said Israeli consul Zehavit Ben Hillel. "Israel is a democracy in a sea of oppressive totalitarian regimes."

Arnold Friedman, a survivor and president of the CHRA, concluded the ceremony by echoing Ben Hillel's point.

"As long as there is a strong Israel, there will be no Auschwitz," Friedman said.

"Nobody will defend Jews like the Jews themselves."

A Message To Our Community

It has been over five weeks since Baycrest activated its SARS plan.

While it has been a challenging and stressful time for clients, family and Baycrest staff, the precautions have helped to protect our environment and vulnerable population from this severe illness.

Looking ahead...

Baycrest has already taken major steps to resume full services. We have started to bring back the most urgent services required by our clients who live here and in the community. All other services are being phased in gradually. This will continue, assuming there are no changes in the SARS situation in Toronto and that the Ministry of Health does not issue new restrictive Directives.

You can monitor our phase-in plans a number of ways:

www.baycrest.org

Wagman Hotline at ext. 3573

Because of the extremely serious nature of SARS, we must remain vigilant in taking appropriate precautions to protect our environment.

We continue to screen everyone who enters Baycrest and ensure they follow infection control rules once inside. The screening and infection control precautions are two of the most important defences we have to keep SARS out of Baycrest.

It has truly been a team effort that has helped protect Baycrest from SARS – and that team includes our community.

Thank you!

Volunteers collect clothes, toys for needy Israelis

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

People from all parts of the community came together before Passover to volunteer their time and energy to collect 1,000 bags of clothing, linens and toys for needy families in Israel.

The ongoing mitzvah project has certainly grown from its modest roots. It was conceived and spearheaded by Ellie Korenblum 18 years ago after the death of her father Henry Korenblum, when she and here family decided to send his clothes to Israel to be distributed to needy people and new immigrants.

The letters of gratitude they received afterward indicated there was a need for such an effort.

Over the years, starting with just a handful of volunteers, she and others have collected clothing and toys sent them to Israel with people travelling to the Jewish state.

In Israel, the clothing is sold by other volunteers at very low prices or given away to the poor at Beged Yad Leyad stores affiliated with Yad Eliezer.

Korenblum says the philosophy of the gemachs (thrift shops) is to not make the client feel that he or she is receiving charity.

Two years ago, the project really took off when Naomi Pinczower assumed the task of promoting the project to day schools and Philip Davidovits offered his garage for storage between shipments. With their efforts, thousands of bags have since been collected and shipped in 40-foot containers.

Korenblum said the recent Passover collection of clothing and toys was "overwhelming."

Helen Cooper – who chairs B'nai Brith's Heart to Heart project and who is active with Kids For Kids, which helps children suffering trauma as a result of the intifadah – says the toys are distributed to children with cancer and others recovering in Israeli hospitals and other facilities.

At the end of the Hadassah-WIZO Bazaar last October, Cooper and 30 volunteers – many of whom were students from the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT) – packed up unsold clothing and sent them to Israel.

"The community's co-operation for the Passover shipment was exhilarating," Korenblum said. "There were solid lines of cars moving slowly along Glen Park Avenue to where the 40-foot container was parked."

Among the volunteers helping to load the container were students from Yeshiva Darchei Torah, Ulpanat Orot, Bais Yaakov, Yeshiva Gdola and Yeshivat Or Chaim.

Korenblum said many more volunteers are needed to load the next shipment on Sunday, June 1. She said high school students who volunteer can count their hours toward their community service credit.

She said the project's only expenses are for shipping and Israeli VAT tax. "Many individuals and community organizations have generously contributed money to offset these costs and we are very grateful."

Korenblum has received many letters thanking the Toronto community for their generosity.

One said: "In these difficult economic and social times in Israel, you have all truly made the quality difference for many families."

For more information, or to drop off clothing and toys, call Philip Davidovits, 416-617-8713 (no Sabbath calls).

The call of holy days

By RABBI LEIGH LERNER

Parshat Emor tells us, "These are the seasons of the Eternal One that you shall call sacred." Sometimes the simplest part of a sentence has the most meaning. What does it mean to call something sacred?

It's a good start to call something holy, but names aren't enough. When something is holy in name only, it doesn't touch us deeply.

So it is with Yom Ha'atzmaut, Israeli Independence Day, which fell this week and which some streams of Judaism have put on the sacred calendar. We can say that Yom Ha'atzmaut is a Jewish festival, but unless we mark it as such, unless we invest it with ceremony and actions that speak of our resolve to maintain and support the State of Israel, Yom Ha'atzmaut will remain for Diaspora Jews a day that is called a festival, but on which nothing happens.

Therefore, it is essential that we begin to develop mitzvot for Yom Ha'atzmaut: to attend a community rally or program, to give tzedakah, to pray in services for Israel's welfare, to call a relative in Israel on that day, to resolve to make a trip to Eretz Yisrael.

"To call" may also refer to the concept of shouting or crying aloud, to raise a voice. A Jew who is willing to raise a voice about Shabbat and the holidays may be demonstrating pride in them publicly. We should not feel that we have to hide our Jewishness. We have a right to our Jewish heritage and a right to be public about it, if we wish. And sometimes in life, we have to be public about it to defend ourselves.

Last year's Yom Ha'atzmaut rally in Montreal filled downtown streets in a remarkable show of solidarity, a public demonstration at a time when Israel especially needed to know that we care. Across Canada, the public solidarity that our communities show for the State of Israel through peaceful, enthusiastic and heartfelt gatherings and demonstrations makes an impression on those around us.

These vital rallies of thousands of Jewish souls on a key day in our contemporary Jewish calendar speak volumes, not only about what matters to us, but about the citizens who compose our community – we are activists, yet we are creators of shalom. We should also show our Jewish commitment by attending public services of worship throughout the calendar year.

The verb "to call" may also refer to the idea of convening or gathering a group. Moses declares the sacred occasions to be Shabbat, Pesach, the upcoming festival of Shavuot – which marks the giving of the Torah – as well as Rosh Hashanah, Yom Kippur and Sukkot.

How wonderful that we read of these days at the edge of summer, a time when we're inclined to disperse to golf courses, tennis courts, restaurant terraces and parks. Emor reminds us that even in summer, there will be Shabbat every week, a day to call the family together for prayer and rest of a different, meaningful nature. And there will yet be Shavuot, whose great commandments overarch our lives, and we must make sure to reserve it on our calendar for family.

We cannot forget our day-to-day actions and how they affect those around us, or else we'll have even more to worry about when Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur arrive. And we must not let the lazy summer heat keep us from attending to our affairs, so that the harvest in autumn will sustain us when we are called to gather for Sukkot.

A tempting slippery slope

By ELLIOTT MALAMET

JEWISH EDUCATION
The Next Generation

Probably the most controversial philosopher in the world today is a mild-mannered, bespectacled son of Holocaust survivors who is a professor of bioethics at Princeton University's Center for Human Values. His advocacy of infanticide, euthanasia and – more recently – bestiality, has made headlines, and within academic circles anyway, his views have led to impassioned debates about ethics in the modern world.

His popularization of the term "speciesism" and the contention that humans and animals are of identical moral standing has led to greater visibility for the animal rights movement. He has been described as "Herod's propaganda chief" as well as an apologist for "the culture of death." His name is Peter Singer.

The paradox of Singer's biography cannot fail to elicit surprise. While his parents, Cora and Ernst Singer, fled Vienna at the time of the Nazi Anschluss, almost his entire extended family were killed. Yet the strict utilitarian bent of Singer's thinking leads to the following statement with respect to a significantly handicapped newborn: "We should put aside feelings based on the small, helpless and – sometimes – cute appearance of human infants… If we can put aside these emotionally moving but strictly irrelevant aspects of the killing of a baby, we can see that the grounds for not killing persons do not apply to newborn infants."

The irony of this posture against the tragic shadow of Singer's own family history is so severe as to provoke the question as to whether Singer's philosophy is a deliberately planned attempt to distinguish "acceptable death" from unthinkable extermination.

Utilitarianism was founded by Jeremy Bentham in the late 18th century and modified by John Stuart Mill shortly thereafter. It is a theory that holds "the good" is based on the most pleasurable consequences for the largest group of people, though, of course, what constitutes "pleasure" becomes prone to subjective wrangling. Unbreakable moral rules figure nowhere in this result-oriented universe. "Are we happy yet?" would be the dumbed down credo of a utilitarian.

But Singer is no fool, nor is he a racist. He is entirely cognizant of the repercussions of his positions. As an atheist, he sees the development of human morality strictly in terms of evolutionary biology and cultural relativism. Moral claims thus have no objective status, as Singer argues repeatedly: "So ethics loses its air of mystery. Its principles are not laws written up in heaven. Nor are they absolute truths about the universe known by intuition. The principles of ethics come from our own nature as social, reasoning beings."

One wonders at Singer's faith in systematic reason and also at how he understands the proliferation of nonrational behaviour that seems omnipresent in our world today.

But as a teacher of Jewish ethics, my interest in Singer is clearly neither neutral nor unbiased. I am increasingly aware of a shift in my students toward an acceptance of relativistic ethics. Though many would still hold out against some of Singer's more radical formulations, such as the acceptability of certain forms of infanticide or "intimacy" with animals, the slippery slope of non-divine-based morality is a slide that many Jewish students and their parents are increasingly tempted to take.

What lies at the bottom of this post-Enlightenment ride remains to be seen, though readers of Peter Singer are offered one chilling version of such a "moral" future.

Jewish Life

An outstanding philosopher

Communings of the Spirit: The Journals of Mordecai M. Kaplan Volume 1 1913-1934*, edited by Mel Scult Wayne State University Press.

At his death in 1938 at the age of 102, Mordecai Kaplan, founder of the Reconstructionist Movement and one of the outstanding Jewish philosophers of our era, could look back on an extraordinarily active and fruitful life.

Books
Bernard Baskin

As rabbi, teacher, writer and lecturer he was an original and creative bridge-builder between Judaism and the advanced thought of the day, between the Jew of yesterday and the Jew of tomorrow. He refuted the "intellectual" who glibly asserted that we have outgrown the tenets of Judaism as well as the "traditionalist" who believed that Judaism can remain static and immobile while life is in constant flux.

Starting in 1913 and continuing until the late 1970s, Kaplan kept a diary or journal that reached astonishing length: 27 volumes, each with 350 to 400 handwritten pages. The present volume of over 500 pages represents only about 20 per cent of the whole and covers a 20-year period from 1913 to 1934.

All of the author's major religious ideas, problems with his congregants, social events, encounters with eminent Jewish personalities, daily life at the Jewish Theological Seminary, the core of his weekly sermons and numerous other topics are frankly set down in these diary entries. For anyone interested in the workings of a highly original mind, an indomitable personality and an often troubled man, this volume makes for addictive reading.

Holding and teaching unorthodox ideas in a largely Conservative seminary, often confronted by disapproving colleagues, he was understandably depressed. He had few intimates with whom he could share his inner life.

"I have been very much in the dumps of late," he wrote. "The longer I live the more alone I feel. I have not a single friend or companion in the world with whom I can share my interests and problems… In all the years that I have worked in the field of Judaism I have not succeeded in finding anybody who would be willing to collaborate with me on any project for the advancement or reconstruction of Judaism."

It is no surprise that when Rabbi Stephen Wise invited him to the newly organized Jewish Institute of Religion, Kaplan was very tempted to leave the seminary. Rabbi Wise extended the invitation a number of times. In 1927, Kaplan finally accepted and tendered his resignation. There was, however, such a great uproar from the rabbinical students and from the seminary alumni that Kaplan decided to stay.

All his life, Kaplan struggled with the idea of God that was consistent with reality—as he understood it—and more in keeping with the actual thinking of most Jews.

It was a ceaseless quest. "I know very well what I mean by God. God to me is the process that makes for creativity, integration, love and justice. The function of prayer is to render us conscious of that process. I am not troubled by the fact that God is not perfect. He would have to be static to be perfect… Nothing dynamic can be perfect since to be dynamic implies to be in the state of becoming. But how shall I relate all these ideas to the problem of Jewish religion?"

Often dismissed as a humanist and outmoded thinker, Kaplan still challenges Jews who are alert to tough theological problems and concerned about the creative renewal of the Jewish community.

Mel Scult's introduction is informative and his annotations are helpful. He has edited an invaluable work. We look forward to forthcoming volumes.

Yiddishe Mamas – Part 1

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

"My Yiddishe mama – I miss her more than ever now/ My Yiddishe mama – I long to kiss her wrinkled brow/ I long to hold her hand once more as in days gone by/ And ask her to forgive me for things I did that made her cry."

A lot of people will think of and thank their Yiddishe mamas this Sunday. Although Mother's Day and its greeting card and flowers juggernaut are not a Jewish creation, now is as good a time as ever to celebrate our Jewish mothers – and visit some lovely sites on the World Wide Web.

CLAL-The National Jewish Center for Learning and Leadership mentions that "we've been honouring our mothers [and fathers] since Mt. Sinai. So why should we care about Mother's Day?" They point out that Jewish tradition is filled with reverence for mothers all the way from the story of the matriarchs to King Solomon's Proverbs: "My child… do not walk away from the wisdom of your mother, for it will be a sign of grace upon your head." (Proverbs 1:8-9) [http://www.believenet.com/story/23/story_2370_1.html]

That being the case, the rabbis at CLAL have created a "Jewish Mother's Day Card" that explores how to mark this secular holiday "Jewishly":

- Meditate or reflect for a moment on each of the following words and how they connect you to your mother: protection, independence, guidance, nurturing.
- In what ways could you forgive your mother?
- In addition to the flowers, dinner, or phone call, write a letter or send a card, which conveys what the relationship has meant to you. [http://www.clalrabbis.net/mothers_day_card. htm]

Liba Pearson has a bit of disconnect in her life. She writes at Aish.com, "Mother's Day is not a Jewish holiday; it's a brilliantly contrived marketing tool. But try telling that to my mother." Pearson says a day for mothers really isn't such a bad idea, "but every day should really be Mother's Day… It's a strange truth that parents always love their kids more than the kids love their parents. They put so much into us, give us so much, that the bond they form with us is far deeper than anything we could feel back. It seems we can never appreciate them enough. I still think that Mother's Day was created by Hallmark. But you know what? Mothers – mine first among them – deserve it, and how." [http://www.aish.com/family/mensch/Real_Jewish_Mothers.asp]

When people claim that Mother's Day is not a Jewish holiday, they aren't completely correct. According to Eliezer Segal, a sort of Mother's Day is observed in Israel on the 11th of the month of Cheshvan in the fall. That day is the traditional date of the death of the matriarch Rachel. Segal investigates what it is about Rachel's life that embodies the Jewish ideal of motherhood, – she who "for much of her married life had to resign herself to watching her sister Leah bear Jacob many children, until she finally gave birth to Joseph." [http:// www.ucalgary.ca/~elsegal/Shokel/910501_Mothers_Day.html]

Inda Schaenen wants to be a Yiddishe mama. The problem is that she had no role model, since she grew up with a Jewish mother not a Yiddishe mama. ("Her body was Jean Naté and hair dye, razors and eyebrow tweezers. Our kitchen did not reek of the yeasty, buttery, beefy fumes of daily cookery. It smelled clean.") To fill in the gap, Schaenen has found someone else to look up to: Molly Goldberg and the wisdom she imparts in Schaenen's dog-eared copy of the The Molly Goldberg Jewish Cookbook. As Schaenen explains, the cookbook "became a kind of lodestone for me: If I cooked with enough butter, salt, sour cream and chicken fat, I could land myself and my family in the warm, loving, safe world of Molly Goldberg." Unfortunately, Schaenen has had a bit of falling out with her newfound "mama." But you'll have to read her article at Salon.com to find out what happened. [http://www.salon.com/mwt/feature/1999/03/30feature.html]

Finally, there is Ellen O'Brien who has a different kind of dilemma. Ellen's mother isn't a Yiddishe mama. Actually, Ellen's mother isn't even Jewish. She just acts as if she is. Ellen was OK with her mother's phone calls to tell her that it was raining and her warnings not to wear an underwire bra to the airport. Things started to get odd when her mother signed Ellen up at a mostly-Jewish dating agency. [http://makeashorterlink.com/?D24722C54]

Ontario private school tax credit back on track

For the first time ever, parents of Jewish day school students in Ontario took advantage of the new provincial tax credit originally announced by former Finance Minister, Jim Flaherty in the May 2002 provincial budget.

This year, parents were entitled to a maximum deduction of $700 per child registered at a day school. By 2006, this five-year phase-in program will provide parents with a maximum tax credit of $3,500 per child.

"This is further illustration of the absolute justice in this tax credit which rectifies years of injustice towards our faith-based schools," says Marshall Kesten, Chair, UJA Federation Board of Jewish Education. "Citizens of Ontario who opt for private faith-based education, now enjoy some of the benefits of the taxes they pay toward provincial education. This is very exciting."

Ontario Premier Ernie Eves froze the credits at 10 per cent in the June, 2002 budget, saying that the province could not afford to increase them as was originally planned.

However, on March 21 of this year, Eves announced that the five-year program was back on.

"When the government imposed a moratorium a year ago, it promised us that it would be a short-lived, one-year freeze, and it lived up to its promise," says Ed Morgan, Chair, Canadian Jewish Congress Ontario Region.

"We're very pleased that the government is back on track. Within five years, this tax credit will be fully phased in and will provide $3,500 worth of tax relief to every Jewish Day School parent in Ontario," he said.

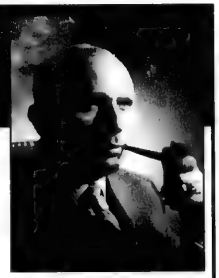
Joe Godfrey 1920 – 1998



Joe Godfrey spent 50 years at the top of his profession, earning six Canadian Housing Design Council awards. His prominence led him into the Greater Toronto Home Builders' Association's Hall of Fame in 1986.

But Joe didn't just build houses. Rather, he built communities — subdivisions for the general population and synagogues and schools for his beloved Jewish community.

He was the force behind Beth El Congregation, starting it in the basement of one of his apartment buildings before quickly opening a Sunday school to give the shul's youth a Jewish head start. When Beth El merged with Temple Emanu-El in 1969, Joe stayed involved, welcoming visiting Rabbis and scholars into his home while regularly attending services and bible classes. He was a major supporter of Associated Hebrew Schools and Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT), proudly carpooling his three children and their cousins to Associated almost every day. He generously backed many Jewish charities including UJA Federation and Jerusalem's Bible Lands Museum.

"Being Jewish was fundamental to Dad's life," recalls his son Norman, who followed his father's example by involving himself in many UJA Federation initiatives. "It was an integral part of who he was, and through his example our entire family has developed strong attachments to synagogue life, to Jewish education, and to the Jewish community."

Joe was born in Zbarasz, Poland, in 1920. His father, a furniture maker, was an observant Jew who instilled a strong sense of Jewish identity into his three children. After years of cheder, Joe began studying to be an agricultural engineer but had to give up his studies when war broke out. In 1939, along with his brother Nathan, he joined the Russian army as a Polish officer and secured himself a job building bridges for the army's engineering corps.

But with the Russians marching into Poland at the end of the war and his parents killed, Joe knew it was time to get out. One day while on a military base, Joe flashed his Polish engineering insignia at a soldier guarding an airplane and was in the sky well before the soldier realized the badge wasn't the Russian military intelligence symbol he had thought it was. Back on the ground, Joe met a Jewish doctor who helped him escape to Germany. In 1948, Joe set sail for Canada, settling in Toronto and working as a carpenter before opening his own construction business. It still flourishes today, run by Joe's two sons, under the banner Yorkwood Homes Ltd.

Joe married his wife Rose, whom he met on the boat. Together they raised three children — Sima, Norman and Myer — and kvelled over their seven grandchildren. They loved to travel and did it often, always seeking out Jewish life in every city they visited. It made for interesting experiences, like the time they went to shul in Spain and ended up joining the Bar Mitzvah celebrations of the son of the United States Air Force commander. Or the time they noticed that the Japanese woman behind the desk at their hotel in Japan had a Hebrew name. Turns out she had married an Israeli but had moved back to Japan after the Gulf War. Joe and Rose spent the entire holiday talking to her in Hebrew, with the rest of the tourists in their group thinking the Godfreys were fluent in Japanese.

"Joe embraced Judaism because it had been taken away from him during the war," says Rose. "It's the reason he looked for it everywhere he went."

"Joe saw first hand what happened to our people and he didn't want to lose any more Jews through assimilation," says Gerald, who recalls Joe's joy at seeing Israeli children at the Canada Centre in Metulla, so full of life. "That's why Jewish education was so important to him. He felt that by teaching them about their heritage, their faith would stay solid."

When he wasn't building or traveling, Joe could probably be found at his cottage, on his rowboat, reading a book or spending time with friends. Or he would be at shul, debating with the rabbi or his fellow worshippers about the state of the world or the state of the kiddush. Or thinking about new ways to assist Toronto's Jewish community. Today, the Joseph Godfrey Memorial Fund at UJA Federation's Jewish Foundation of Greater Toronto directs funds to meet important community needs.

"No matter what went wrong, Joe would always shake it off and say, 'Let's enjoy what we've got,'" recalls Rabbi Arthur Bielfeld of Temple Emanu-El. "He often quoted an old proverb: The liveliest fish swims against the current. Joe lived by that. And if there's one thing he taught us, it's this: May it never be said merely that life was good to us, but that we were good to life."

Legacy of Life is a presentation of the Jewish Foundation of Greater Toronto to honour the memory of those who have made an exceptional contribution to our community.

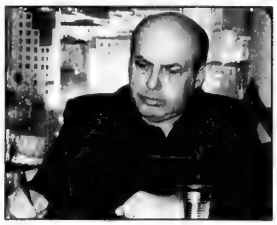
Israel and World Jewry share same fate: Sharansky

The worldwide forces that are questioning Israel's legitimacy are also attacking Jews everywhere, warned Israeli cabinet minister Natan Sharansky, in a recent satellite address from Jerusalem to a group of UJA Federation donors.

"There is virtually no difference between anti-Zionism and anti-Semitism, between those who apply a double standard to Israel and those who apply a double standard to Jews," said the Israeli government's primary liaison with the Diaspora.



Natan Sharansky

Sharansky cited dozens of protests around the world against the Iraq War as proof of the alliance between anti-Semitism and anti-Zionism. "We saw," he said, "how demonstrations against the war turned into demonstrations against America, then against Israel and then into small pogroms."

The minister also praised the U.S.-led war on Saddam Hussein's regime and directed a large dose of criticism against Saudi Arabia, which he called "the ideological base of terror," through its financing of the Muslim philosophy of Wahabism, which has spawned radical Islamic movements.

"America did a very important service for the struggle against terror," said Sharansky in strongly endorsing the U.S. war against Iraq. "I hope that the world will see very shortly that the Arabs deserve democracy as much as the Jews."

Sharansky's sentiments were echoed by UJA Federation Campaign 2004 Chairs Allan Silber and Richard Venn.

"The Jewish world is under attack," Silber added.

UJA Federation Campaign 2004 is promising a Global Jewish Action Plan to assist Israel's weakened social service network; combat anti-Israel hatred, which is tinged with anti-Semitism; and help a new Jewish generation deal with the dangerous forces they face in a changing world.

The luncheon for UJA Federation's International Leadership Reunion donors, at which Sharansky spoke, was chaired by Irving Granovsky, Saul Koschitzky and Barry Sherman.

Toronto remembers on Yom Hashoah

More than 2,000 members of Toronto's Jewish community attended an emotional Yom Hashoah (Holocaust Remembrance Day) commemoration service at Earl Bales Park last week, the largest single-day gathering outside of Israel.

The ceremony included six candle-lightings, one for each million Jews killed by the Nazis, with the final lighting going to Andrew Benyei, who also received a "Righteous Among the Nations" award in memory of his late father, Laszlo. Andrew was presented with his father's posthumous award by Israeli Consul General, Meir Romem, who spoke about the importance of this year's commemoration service in light of the worldwide resurgence of anti-Semitism.

"Every Jew and every person in the world must remember the Holocaust forever," Romem told the capacity crowd. "Unfortunately today, especially in the last two or three years, anti-Semitism is on the rise, not only in Europe and Israel, but even here, in this great country. We must fight today against anti-Semitism and keep strong ties with the State of Israel, which is always the best way of ensuring Jewish survival. Israel is our response to those who tried to exterminate us. The Jewish people and the land of Israel will live forever."

During the Holocaust, Laszlo Benyei, a non-Jewish Budapest native, saved a young Jewish girl, Eva Kerty, from the Nazis and then married her to provide her with a foolproof identity. Laszlo died of cancer four years after Andrew's birth, at age 34.

"This is very emotional for me, and all of us," said Andrew who attended the event with mother Eva, now 81, and his wife Judie. "This is in recognition of my father, without whom I obviously wouldn't be here tonight. Many other family members also wouldn't be with us today if not for my father."

Also addressing the crowd was Nechemia Wurman a 76-year-old man who, after escaping from a Nazi slave labour camp, joined the Partisan Resistance Fighters.

"The question I am asked more than any other is 'how could the Jews allow themselves to have been destroyed without resistance,'" said Wurman. "I tell them that, despite so many obstacles and limited resources, Jews did resist. We operated out of ghettos, even in the worst hell of Auschwitz and Treblinka, but we did fight as much as humanly possible."

The commemoration service also included emotional musical presentations performed by grade 9-12 students from the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto.

Sponsors of the evening's service included: The UJA Federation Board of Jewish Education and Holocaust Centre of Toronto; B'nai Brith Canada; Canadian Holocaust Remembrance Association; Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario Region; Canadian Society for Yad Vashem; Consulate General of Israel; General Wingate Branch 256 Royal Canadian Legion; Hillel of Greater Toronto; Jewish Holocaust Survivors of Canada; Jewish War Veterans of Canada Toronto Post; Toronto Board of Rabbis; Toronto Council of Hazzanim; Toronto Vaad Ha-Rabbanim.

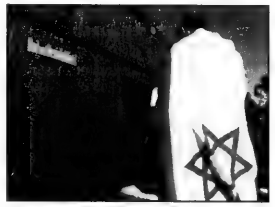
Thousands of Jewish teens — from Canada and countries around the world — are currently bringing to a close an experience that they will carry with them for the rest of their lives, as the annual March of the Living program wraps up.

The March of the Living, sponsored in Toronto by UJA Federation, brings Jewish youth from around the world to Poland to tour Holocaust sites and march the three-kilometre trek from Auschwitz to Birkenau, the largest concentration camp complex built by the Nazis during World War II.



All participants take part in educational seminars specifically created for the March of the Living, designed to teach the teens about the Holocaust, Israel, anti-Semitism, the rise of Nazi Germany and much more.

Following their trip to Poland, the Canadian teens joined thousands of other M.O.L. participants and Israeli teens in Israel to celebrate Yom Ha'atzmaut — Israel's 55th Independence Day — as part of a colourful and exciting finale.

Each participant marched the three-kilometre route hand-in-hand and in silence with other Jewish teenagers, representing 30 nations, as a tribute to all the victims of the Holocaust.

"It [the March] was just the most incredibly inspiring experience of my life," said Toronto's Yonit Nisan, 19, in an interview from Poland. "Over the years, the Holocaust was always naturally a part of me like my hair or eye colour, and I assumed I knew all there was to know about it. But, once I got here that changed dramatically. To see and touch history, seeing what they saw all those years ago, really brings home the reality of the horrors they endured. Now we must go to Israel and celebrate her birthday, especially in light of what we saw in Poland."

"Everything we've seen and done in Poland makes me want to get to Israel that much sooner, because it all makes you appreciate the importance of Israel even more," said Brian Fishbein, an 18-year-old Torontonian. "One thing that was truly amazing was when we davened the other day in this small community called Kazimercj Dolnys. We were in the cemetery, surrounded by tombstones, some dating back to the 1700s. Seeing all these amazing sights, visiting the concentration camps and the cemeteries, you really get a sense and an appreciation of what it must have been like here."

Brampton shul celebrates its 25th anniversary

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

What started 25 years ago as a get-together for Jewish women living in the Brampton area has evolved into the community's first and only Jewish congregation.

It was at that meeting, at the home of Brampton resident Gail Grossman, that the seeds for Temple Har Tikvah's precursor, the North Peel Jewish Association, were planted.

Prior to the temple's recent anniversary celebration, founding members Lawrie and Charron Bloom and Maureen Rich said that the dozen or so people who got together that evening in 1977 were anxious to create a sense of Jewish identity in the north Peel area.

"We started a Hebrew school and a play group, and we celebrated Jewish holidays together. Within a couple of years, the group grew to 50 families," said Lawrie Bloom, longtime president of the synagogue, who has also acted as lay leader and cantor.

In the early 1980s, the association affiliated itself with the Reform movement, and Temple Har Tikvah was created. "The name means mountain of hope. We were climbing a mountain, and we were hoping to succeed," said Bloom.

The congregation, which moved into its present location, a 130-year-old building on Torbram Road, in 1983, last year hired its second full-time spiritual leader, Rabbi Nancy Morris. The temple's first rabbi, Larry Lander, moved to London, Ont. several years ago, and in between, the congregation was served by a number of student rabbis.

Rabbi Morris, who had been one of the students, said that although Har Tikvah's numbers have never been huge – there are now 35 families – "I have often heard members say they could not imagine joining anywhere else.

"They like the atmosphere of a smaller congregation, even if it means they have to work harder. Everyone here has to pitch in and contribute to the work that keeps the congregation financially viable. That seems to enhance rather than hinder their feelings of attachment."

There is a family feeling among the congregants, said Bloom. "If there is a simchah or a tragedy, everyone is there. We have to be committed to the congregation in order to keep it going.

"When the temple building was under construction, some members laid down flooring and built cupboards and one built the memorial board."

Temple membership has in the past reached 60 families, said Bloom. "Some new families have joined, but some have left the area. The core group of us work hard to keep it going. Parents who are able act as bar mitzvah tutors and teach Hebrew school."

In a small congregation, he said, members have a different appreciation of what a rabbi is all about. "When I went to Hebrew school, we only saw the rabbi when we were in trouble.

"Here, the rabbi is part of the everyday life of the temple. She feels a strong connection with the congregants. Our children feel close enough to pick up the phone and call her," said Bloom.

Despite being the only Jewish congregation in the area, they have always felt part of the Brampton community at large, he said.

"We had a couple of incidents in the late '80s, in which vandals painted anti-Semitic slogans on the building. Some of our neighbours sent us money to help us clean up the building. They rallied around us."

In the past, he said, temple members have run an Israeli pavilion in the multicultural event Carabram, and they have been involved in the mayor's race relations committee.

"We're also taking part in the upcoming Open Doors Brampton, in which 30 historical, cultural and religious buildings will be open to the community to see what they're all about."

Future plans, said Bloom, include developing a 1.67 acre lot that the temple owns. "We are looking at a real success story."

Remember Yiddish Momme this Mother's Day

By MIRIAM CHINSKY
Special to The CJN

"My Yiddishe Momme I need her more than ever now
My Yiddishe Momme, I'd love to kiss that wrinkled brow
I long to hold her hands once more as in days gone by
And ask her to forgive me for things I did that made her cry
How few were her pleasures she never cared for fashion's styles
Her jewels and treasures she had them in her babies' smiles
Oh I know that I owe what I am today, to that dear little lady, so old and gray."

The song Yiddish Momme, written in 1925 by Jack Yellen with Lew Pollack, in memory of Yellen's own mother, embodies a warmth and yearning that resonate in the soul to this day.

Born July 6, 1892, in Razcki, Poland, Yellen lived until 1991, a span of 99 years. Arriving in the United States with his family at the age of five, he began writing words and music while still at school in Buffalo and later worked as a reporter for a local newspaper. Bent on becoming a professional songwriter with a focus on lyrics, he moved to New York City. He served in the U.S. army during World War I.

Early in the Roaring Twenties he wrote Down By The O-H-I-O with Abe Olman. Collaborating with composer Milton Ager, he penned such works as Hard-Hearted Hannah, The Vamp From Savanah and the popular Ain't She Sweet?

Their productive association continued when the advent of the talkies lured them to Hollywood. There they contributed words and music for numerous films, including Shirley Temple's Captain January and Rebecca of Sunnybrook Farm.

Their bouncy Happy Days Are Here Again became the theme song for President Franklin D. Roosevelt and the Democratic party as the nation emerged from the Depression under Roosevelt's New Deal. Happy Days was revived in a slow, non-political interpretation by Barbra Streisand in the 1963 release of her first album.

But it was Sophie Tucker's riveting rendition of Yiddishe Momme that plucked the heartstrings of listeners from almost all backgrounds. Belle Baker, a contemporary of Tucker, invested Yiddishe Momme with no less fervour.

Once, when I heard Baker at the Towne Casino in Buffalo, she closed her show with Yiddishe Momme, and there wasn't a dry eye in the house.

After World War II, Yellen wrote My Mother's Sabbath Candles and Toronto's incredibly talented Barbara Gryfe, then 9, made the melody her own when she sang with intuitive tam (feeling, flavour):

"Among the smiles, among the tears, of my childhood's sweet and bitter years
There's picture that my mem'ry fondly frames and in it softly shine two tiny flames
My Mother's Sabbath Candles, that made our home so bright, that faithfully she lighted with a prayer each Friday night
And then around the table we gathered and we heard my father chant the Kiddush, his heart in every word.
Our humble home became a mansion in that mystic glow; our hearts were filled again with hopes and dreams of long ago.
Through all the tragic story of Israel's darkest nights, they've never dimmed the glory of my mother's Sabbath Lights."

Yellen, who had written both lyrics and music, declared that no one could sing Sabbath Lights like Gryfe and sent her a letter affirming, "You were wonderful. You are just naturally a professional. You've got something no one can give you. You have to be born with it — and you certainly were."

Over the decades, Yellen gauged the mood of the people, made them laugh and cry and just enjoy. He was one of the first members of ASCAP (American Society of Composers, Authors and Publishers) and served on the board from 1951-69. Although much of his work was centred in New York City he often commuted to Buffalo and was active in that city's Jewish community throughout his career.

When he retired in the late 1940s to devote more time to his egg farm interests, it was a departure from his previous lifestyle, but he left a legacy noted for two exceptional tributes to mothers.

Anti-Israel Rally at York University January 2003

Calling all U of T Alumni

Campus life in the past may have had its stresses and strains but nothing compares to the difficult position Jewish students now find themselves in on campus. Anti-Israel, anti-Semitic rhetoric is forcing Jewish students to face grave challenges.

Hillel of Greater Toronto together with Jewish Toronto Tomorrow in recognizing the urgent need for a significant presence at Canada's largest University is building the Wolfond Centre for Jewish Campus Life on the northwest corner of Harbord and Huron at the heart of the University of Toronto.

Hillel of Greater Toronto is calling on all Jewish Alumni of the University of Toronto to identify with this initiative by becoming part of the upcoming alumni campaign.

A series of events directed at U of T Jewish Alumni will be held in the coming months to create a link between past and the future of Jewish student life at U of T.

To share any memorabilia of your campus years, or to assist in the campaign and help build the Jewish future at U of T, please contact Michelle at 416-785-1465 or

Former butcher keeps knife sharp carving wood

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Master wood carver and violin maker, Lewis Cohen, 87, earned his living for many years as a butcher.

It doesn't matter if you are carving meat or wood, he says. "Your knife has to be sharp."

Cohen attended Central Technical School and wanted to become an electrical engineer, but his father, Jacob, insisted that he come to work for him in his butcher shop.

Since childhood, however, Cohen has spent his spare time working with wood. "I was always a perfectionist in wood." he says. "My lowest mark in woodworking at school was 100."

Now retired, Cohen teaches wood carving at Earl Bales Seniors Centre four mornings a week, and at the Bayview Community Centre on Thursday nights.

When he was eight years old, he started to take violin lessons and played at Massey Hall and other venues from the age of 10 until arthritis began to affect him in recent years.

"I bought my first violin in 1929. It was 200 years old and I paid $100 to repair it. That was one year's salary."

When he was 16, he met his wife-to-be, Zelda. They had six children, four boys and two girls. He proudly says he has eight grandchildren and one great-grandchild.

He gave his first violin to his daughter, Sandra Cohen, who plays the violin and the viola.

When his wife died in 1982, he was 67. He says he was filled with despair and stopped working.

The following year, he signed up for a violin-making course. To date, he has made seven violins and two violas; two other violins are in progress.

Cohen derives great joy from sharing his wood carving talent. When he speaks of his wood-carving students and their accomplishments, his face lights up and he becomes animated.

He also loves to share. He gives away hundreds of his small wood carvings, which he personally signs at the many shows he participates in throughout Ontario.

"I enjoy teaching and I don't want any money. I just get enjoyment from watching my students' progress and their accomplishments."

He adds that among wood carvers, men and women, young and old, there is an atmosphere of co-operation.

"I believe that I can make a wood carver out of anyone. All they have to do is what they are told."

He adds that what is important is not what he makes, "but how well I make it."

He likes to work on abstract carvings. "I use any kind of wood and carve whatever comes to my mind. And no two carvings are alike."

Cohen's pieces are in numerous public collections and six of the pieces are in the Windsor Museum of Wood.

By ADAM GRACHNIK
Special to The CJN

If Naomi Parness has her way, not only will her 30-minute documentary garner top marks at Ryerson University, but it will also change the way the world understands the used-clothing industry.

Sounds like just another ambitious student, right? Hardly.

With Ropa Americana having been been screened last month at the prestigious New York International Independent Film and Video Festival and with its sale to the Documentary Channel, a Canadian digital cable station, as well as to the Costa Rican television channel Telekita, Parness' dream could come to fruition sooner than you might think.

"It's the story about the travels of a T-shirt," she says of the film she and her team of four created for her fourth-year practicum class in Ryerson's radio and television arts program, and that is being screened in Toronto this week.

Her group follows the shirt from the time it's donated to a charity in Toronto until it reaches the hands of a needy person in Costa Rica.

Contrary to popular belief, Parness says, the route is anything but straightforward.

In fact, her documentary exposes a multi-million dollar operation in which charities sell donated clothing to middlemen, who turn around and sell the pieces to local stores in the Third World. Ultimately, the clothing is sold to the people who were donors' intended recipients.

"Initially, it was shocking," says Parness, the movie's interviewer and producer. "We started to find reasons and explanations. There are costs, and clothes are still going to clothe someone."

The 22-year old says that if people have negative feelings about people profiting from charity, they can always donate their clothing directly to homeless people in Toronto.

Regardless, she says, her documentary is very objective and exposes important aspects of the industry that, after travelling to Costa Rica, she now understands more fully.

"We took this way beyond school [and] wanted it to be successful," says Parness, a Thornhill native and graduate of Thornlea Secondary School. "This was a major goal, we didn't think we could do it. It was a wonderful experience."

She says the idea to go to Costa Rica to see first-hand where the T-shirts go came about because the group wanted to "find out more.

"Once the project was started, it needed an end-stage," Parness says, adding that her executive producer, Monica Veiga, speaks Spanish.

Determined, the group raised $10,000, hooked up with an honest middleman, who bought T-shirts from the Toronto charity for 10 cents a pound and resold them to a store in Costa Rica for 50 cents a pound. Then they travelled to Central America.

"It's very different to shoot in another country. People don't embrace the camera [as in North America]," Parness says, adding that the most fascinating aspect of the project was interviewing the woman in Costa Rica who actually bought the donated shirt for the equivalent of $2 (Cdn).

Being in the purchaser's home was "weird," and "sort of surreal," she says.

"It didn't hit us until we got home. It was a big feeling of satisfaction."

Parness has a lot of experience in television. She spent two summers in New York City interning at CBS and NY1, a 24-hour local news network, and she is now one of the hosts of Future Zone, a weekly technology show on Rogers Television. But she says it was this project that finally helped her appreciate Ryerson's intensive program, and believes it provides opportunities that other schools don't.

The foursome hope to sell their movie internationally and teach people about an industry Parness describes as a "bittersweet reality."

Ropa Americana is being screened May 8 at Revival, 783 College St. Doors open at 9 p.m. and admission is free. Check out Parness and her team at www.blackboxproductions.tv.

CIC prepares for second year of Parliamentary intern program

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — If the Canada-Israel Committee has its way, there will soon be more Jewish representation on Parliament Hill.

As the first year of its parliamentary internship program winds down, the CIC is is actively recruiting participants for year two.

"There is a shortage of Jews involved in the political sector – becoming Members of Parliament, on Parliament Hill, in riding associations – and we decided that we needed to encourage the involvement of Jews at various levels," said David Cooper, the CIC's assistant director of government relations.

"We decided that we would initiate a parliamentary internship program to give young Jews who are just graduating from university and who are interested in politics a great opportunity to learn the ropes of how the system works and hopefully to encourage them to continue to be involved politically when their term ends."

Having been to Israel on a CIC trip with other MPs, Mills said he was pleased to be asked to participate and welcomed Michael Mandel into his office last fall for what was to be a nine-month placement. The match has been so successful that Mills requested an extension so Mandel can stay with his office until September.

CIC paid Mandel a stipend for the original placement. The extension will be funded by Mills' office.

"I think what makes the program so successful is that those young people that work in members' offices on the Hill, when they return to their communities, wherever that may be, they will have a knowledge and understanding of government from every policy position that is discussed," Mills said.

"In other words, they are not just there to deal with issues on the agenda of the CIC, but with every other issue that is dealt with by a member of Parliament, so you really are training future leaders."

Mandel is a native of Burlington who graduated from Wilfred Laurier University with an honours degree in history. He participated in Birthright Israel in December 2001 and heard about the new CIC program from a Birthright organizer.

He was thrilled to be chosen and pleased with his placement.

"I give credit to David Cooper for placing me with Dennis Mills. It was a perfect fit," he said. "I was prepared to do correspondence, photocopying and make coffee. Rather, I have been working on some very interesting projects and have been able to use some of my ideas… I didn't think I would be involved in policy so quickly, but it has been very exciting."

"This guy one day is going to be a great member of Parliament. He has a value system of caring and sharing for people that is very special and he has a work ethic that is second to none," Mills said.

After graduating from Concordia University with a BA in political science, Montreal native David Granovsky, who was also a Birthright Israel participant, applied for the program and has been working on the Hill since October.

During that time, he has worked with Canadian Alliance foreign affairs critic Stockwell Day and former defence minister Art Eggleton. Since his main interest is in international affairs, he too says he was pleased with his placements.

Until February, Granovsky worked in Day's office. "I was very impressed with what I was working on and how much they [the Alliance] care about Israel," said Granovsky.

Since February, he has worked with Eggleton and has also been involved with foreign affairs issues.

His assignments have involved research, report preparation, correspondence on behalf of the MPs, and attending foreign affairs committee sessions.

Granovsy said that when he completes his term, he intends to work for the Jewish community.

Cooper said the CIC plans to place five interns next fall and already has 15 qualified applicants.

Families sue government

In the meantime, Carly goes to public school during the day and receives ABA after hours at home.

The current system isn't working for Carly, Starr said.

"Last year, Carly was seen sitting in her classroom eating shaving cream, even though her school was notified that she was never to be left unattended for health and safety risks.

"In the past, the application of Carly's individual education plan has been arbitrary," Starr said, "and schools haven't always been willing to provide a program that will maintain continuity between home and school. For example, the Toronto District School Board will not officially allow an ABA-based program into their schools, even if one is being used at home."

The lawyer for the province, Robert Charney, said that over the past three years, the government has recognized the importance of IBI and has had to set priorities while implementing the initial stages of hiring and training therapists.

Based on expert evidence that IBI is most effective when applied between the ages of two and five, the government decided to focus on that age group, Charney said.

However, he noted that the government has expanded the program every year since it began and is committed to increase funding for IBI.

The lawyer for the families, David Corbett, said the current system "is a lot like the Russian Constitution. It looks great on paper, but is lacking in the delivery."

Furthermore, because they see improvement in their children with autism, some families have mortgaged their homes, given up on programs for their other children and put all their savings into ABA therapy, he said.

There is no one size fits all when it comes to children with special needs, Corbett said.

"An ideal system would require co-operation between health and educational authorities and would depend on flexibility."

The trial continues and is expected to last several weeks.

Coast to Coast

Bergman named to Charest cabinet

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

Lawrence Bergman, a tenacious backbencher for the past nine years, has followed in the footsteps of two of his predecessors in the D'Arcy McGee riding and been named a Liberal cabinet minister.

Wearing a kippah throughout the ceremony, Bergman was sworn in on a Chumash he received at his bar mitzvah at Congregation Adath Israel-Poale Zedek in Outremont.

"I am extremely honoured… it brings me great joy. It's also an honour for the entire community," Bergman told The CJN. While he stressed he will represent all citizens of Quebec in cabinet, he allowed that his being Jewish is "something quite significant," especially given "the abundance of talent" from which Charest had to choose.

Bergman said his first task will be to improve his department's efficiency. "I want to make it easier for people to deal with the ministry."

He will likely work closely with Charest on his promised tax cuts of $1 billion a year over the next five years.

Charest followed a Liberal tradition of selecting a Jewish cabinet minister from the predominantly Jewish D'Arcy McGee: in the 1970s, Victor Goldbloom was responsible for the Montreal Olympics, and later Herbert Marx was named justice minister. Marx resigned in 1988 to protest the Bourassa government's bill overriding the Canadian Charter of Rights in order to preserve parts of Bill 101 that were judged by the Supreme Court to be unconstitutional.

Bergman's appointment apparently recognizes the Jewish community's strong support for Charest's campaign, expressed by the overwhelming majority Bergman received from voters, and its financial backing.

Bergman's name did not surface in media speculation about who would likely be in cabinet. It came as something of a surprise that more than one anglophone was included. Some observers had thought the other Jewish MNA, Russell Copeman of Notre-Dame-de-Grâce, had a better chance because of his performance as family critic.

Bergman is actually the fourth Jewish cabinet minister in Quebec. The unelected David Levine served as Premier Bernard Landry's junior health minister from January of last year until his defeat in a byelection four months later.

Bergman's proudest achievement since first being elected in 1994 was his private member's bill that proclaimed Quebec's official recognition of Yom Hashoah. It was passed unanimously by the National Assembly in 1999.

However, Bergman can arguably be credited with setting in motion the chain of events which led to the abrupt resignation of former premier Lucien Bouchard and the exit from politics of the man who had the best chance of leading Quebec to sovereignty.

In December 2000, Bergman initiated a motion condemning Yves Michaud for remarks offensive to Jews. Michaud, a PQ militant and prospective electoral candidate, had chastised Jews for behaving as if they are the only people who have suffered and for not supporting sovereignty.

The assembly's unanimous vote, a very rare censure of an individual, created an uproar and split the PQ. In January 2001, Bouchard announced his resignation, citing personal reasons and his inability to advance the cause of sovereignty. But he also spoke at length about his disillusionment over the Michaud affair.

A notary, Bergman is proud of his deep roots in Quebec. His mother was born in St. Perpetue and his father in St. Romuald, small towns near Quebec City.

He graduated in law from the Université de Montréal in 1965, and practiced as a notary until 1994.

Bergman has had a strong association with the Jewish community. He was president of Congregation Adath Israel-Poale Zedek, an honorary president of the YM-YWHA, and an executive member of the Jewish Community Council.

In 1994, he beat popular independent MNA Robert Libman in a closely fought campaign. After his first term, Bergman quietly stood up against some in the party who would have liked to see a safe seat like D'Arcy McGee go to someone else.

In 1998, he cruised to victory with one of the largest majorities in the province, a feat he repeated last month. His showing was so strong that on election night, the TV networks declared D'Arcy McGee as the first seat to be won in the province.

Despite his certain victory, Bergman was a dogged campaigner, knocking on doors, speaking to groups, and gladhanding in shopping malls.

To do anything less, Bergman said, would be disrespectful to citizens and the democratic process.

In opposition, Bergman served as the critic for consumer protection and the codes governing the professions.

Bergman has had a talent for staying "on message" – never varying from his party's platform and hammering away at the PQ. His earnestness gained him wide respect.

Every year, he has delivered a speech in the National Assembly at Yom Hashoah, and he introduced a motion congratulating Israel on its 50th anniversary.

Bergman overcame personal tragedy when his wife Monica died in 2000 from cancer after a long illness. More than 1,400 people attended her funeral.

In 2001, Bergman led an aggressive campaign to save D'Arcy McGee from being eliminated in an electoral-map revision, collecting thousands of signatures on a petition and getting the endorsement of every major Jewish organization.

Three teens receive peace award from CCCJ

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — Three teenage girls, all students at Ottawa's Ashbury College, were awarded the Good Servant Medals by the Canadian Council of Christians and Jews (CCCJ) last month for their efforts over the past year to promote peace and friendship among religions.

The diplomats' daughters, Lana Ayoub, a Jordanian Christian and daughter of Jordan's Ambassador to Canada; Michelle Divon, an Israeli Jew who is the daughter of Israel's Ambassador to Canada Haim Divon, and Tara Ogaick, a Canadian Muslim whose father is a Canadian diplomat who has served in Saudi Arabia, say they began their relationship on a rocky footing, with mistrust and animosity.

But once they got to know each other, they discovered they had much in common, and they became close friends. They decided that if they could spread their message of peace, there would be hope for peace in the Middle East.

Upon receiving the medal, engraved with a dove emerging from two hands, Ayoub spoke of Jordan's late King Hussein, whom her family had known. "He often spoke of the children of Abraham – Muslims, Christians and Jews – and how they deserve a future worthy of their past," she said.

Divon thanked Ayoub and Ogaick for their courage and said their effort to promote peace has been the most valuable experience in her life so far.

"I accept this award on behalf of all Israelis and Palestinians and all the people of the Middle East who dare to dream of peace and who are willing to take that dream and bring it to fruition," she said.

The girls began their "diplomatic mission" by giving a presentation at their school. Michelle then spoke at a local synagogue and to students at Jewish schools.

Following a recent article in the Ottawa Citizen, the trio became local media celebrities and embarked on numerous speaking engagements.

Ayoub and Divon organized an event at the University of Ottawa that brought together the Muslim Student Association and the Jewish Student Association, students who had never spoken to each other before.

Their efforts have continued and grown, with the girls creating a Web community called Youth United to connect teens around the world to promote dialogue and understanding between Israelis and Palestinians.

Although the girls will be living in different countries when they graduate from high school, they intend to continue their efforts and to keep in touch.

The awards ceremony, attended by various diplomats, politicians, teachers and friends of the CCCJ, was hosted by the National Arts Centre and sponsored in part by the Edward Bronfman Family Foundation.

The Good Servant Medal was created to recognize people who have shown extraordinary service to their community.

Ceremony remembers those who resisted the Nazis

By MICHAEL REGENSTREIF
Special to The CJN

MONTREAL – Falling during the 60th anniversary of the Warsaw Ghetto uprising of April 19 to May 16, 1943, this year's community-wide commemoration of Yom Hashoah – Holocaust Memorial Day – paid tribute to all who resisted and rose up against the Nazis and their genocidal attempt to exterminate European Jewry.

Sara Weinberg, co-chair of the remembrance committee of the Montreal Holocaust Memorial Centre (MHMC), said Jewish resistance to the Holocaust included all of the six million individuals who perished. "Each resisted in his or her own way."

As police and security personnel looked on, about 2,500 people, including many Holocaust survivors and three generations of their descendants, members of the diplomatic corps, representatives of three levels of government and community leaders, filled Congregation Tifereth Beth David Jerusalem to capacity on erev Yom Hashoah.

The program – in English, French, Yiddish and Hebrew – included several addresses and a solemn candlelighting ceremony that incorporated survivor testimony, Holocaust prose and poetry read by children and grandchildren of survivors and songs sung by children's choir from the Jewish People's and Peretz Schools and an adult choir from the Shaar Hashomayim Choral Society.

Weinberg noted that while the Warsaw Ghetto uprising, "the first urban uprising against the Nazis," may be the best-known example of active, Jewish resistance to the Holocaust, there were countless other examples. "There was Jewish resistance in the ghettos," she said, "as well as in the concentration camps and in the forests."

Of the six million, Weinberg's co-chair, Sidney Zoltak, said, "We heard their cry to remember them, and remember them we will. We will continue to bear witness to the spirit of our brethren who were murdered while the world stood by in indifference."

Nina Ben-Ami, Israel's acting consul general in Montreal, told the assembly that all of Israel had come to a standstill for two minutes on Yom Hashoah. "It was as if time had stopped," she said. All activity ceased, every car on every road stopped as drivers and passengers joined the rest of the country in standing at attention.

As in past Yom Hashoah services, the testimonies of Holocaust survivors provided some of the most poignant moments. Ann Kazimirski, who lost 82 members of her family, told the hushed audience how, in 1943, she saw her mother dragged away by Nazi soldiers.

Man recalls how his family saved Dutch Jews in WWII

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — It's possible to know a person for years and yet not know him at all. For Paul Bregman, a lawyer who has had a lengthy professional relationship with Peter Renes, it came as a complete surprise when he recently discovered that Renes had played an important role rescuing Jews in his native Holland during World War II.

Yom Hashoah 5763

Once the story was revealed, Bregman encouraged Renes to share it and arranged for him to speak to students at Ottawa's Yitzhak Rabin High School.

Last week, Renes was also a keynote speaker at Ottawa's annual Yom Hashoah program, held at the Soloway Jewish Community Centre, where he described his family's involvement in saving more than 1,000 Jews during the Holocaust.

Renes recounted how his normally mild-mannered mother became angry when she discovered the Germans had been rounding up Jews.

"My mother had prepared sleeping quarters in the attic and down in the cellar under the stairs, and at nighttime, the bell would ring and people would very silently come home. All talking was hush hush, and they would either go down or upstairs, and my mother would go into the kitchen and start preparing some food."

Renes' father, a railroad operator, worked out a scheme whereby he would throw bags of coal off the train into farmers' fields, and on his days off, he would ride his bicycle along the route, returning with food – bread, flour, cheese, butter, meat – from the farmers.

"And thus my mother was able to feed four or five families at the same time," he said.

The most daring role was played by Renes' uncle, Joop Westerweel, for whom the "Westerweel group" was named. According to Renes, his uncle "single-handedly organized an escape route from Holland through the southern part of Holland, Belgium, France and into the Spanish Pyrenees, through which hundreds and hundreds of young Jewish fellows and girls were able to escape the German Nazis during the years 1941 to 1944."

Although his parents did not want him to be involved, Renes, then 13, became a bicycle thief to help the rescue effort.

"As soon as I came home with a bicycle, my father would dismantle it, store it away in a secret compartment he had made in the coal box at the back of the house, and then from all the components he would repair or rebuild bicycles that would not be recognizable."

The bikes enabled Jews to escape and make it to the border meeting place, where they would be spirited to freedom.

After taking part in many missions, Westerweel was captured near the Dutch border while trying to help two Jewish girls cross from Holland into Belgium en route to the Pyrenees. He was sent to a concentration camp and tortured but never gave any information.

On August 11, 1944, Westerweel was killed by a German firing squad. A forest is planted in Israel in his memory and both Westerweel and his wife, Willy, have been declared Righteous Gentiles.

'I speak for the millions who cannot speak:' survivor

FREDERICTON — Holocaust survivor Philip Riteman says he does not enjoy talking about the war, but he feels compelled to share the horrors he witnesses during the nearly five years he was held in concentration camps in Auschwitz, Birkenau and Dachu.

Riteman was guest speaker last week at the annual Yom Hashoah Holocaust Memorial service at Fredericton's Sgoolai Israel Synagogue.

"I speak for the millions who cannot speak," the Bedford, N.S. resident told the large inter-faith audience.

Riteman was only 13 years old when the Nazis invaded his hometown, Szereszow, on the Polish-Russian border. Now in his 70s and a frequent speaker at schools and community events, the Holocaust is still a painful subject for him.

Guests of honour at the service included Fredericton-Fort Nashwaak MLA Eric MacKenzie, sponsor of the Act to Commemorate the Holocaust Yom Hashoah in New Brunswick that came into force in 2000, and members of the Royal Canadian Legion.

Ruth Chippin, president of the Sisterhood of Sgoolai Israel Synagogue, and the Lilian Freeman chapter of Hadassah-WIZO read a selection from the Book of Joel, which praises the virtue of bearing witness.

Seven memorial candles were kindled. Six candles honoured victims of the Holocaust and Canadian soldiers who lost their lives in World War II.

A seventh candle was kindled in hope of a bright future for all young people by Philip Soicher, a Jewish student in Grade 5 at Fredericton's École Sainte-Anne.

Following the service, a reception was held in the synagogue's social hall.

The courage not to play ball

Last week's column noted that Ellen Pinchuk of CTV News was virtually alone in giving an accurate picture of the limitations on reporting from Iraq ("Public loses when media keep stories under wraps", CJN, May 1).

Pinchuk was among a handful of reporters granted visas to report from Iraq in November 2002 while United Nations weapons inspectors were in the country. In several reports, she noted the restrictions faced by the press, including the "minders" who accompanied all foreign journalists.

According to Reports
By PAUL MICHAELS

In a story posted on CTV's Web site, Pinchuk wrote the following: "For a television reporter, it's incredibly restrictive. You can't shoot any of the cool stuff. That means government buildings and [now-deposed leader] Saddam Hussein's palaces are off limits (even for an exterior shot). No oil pumps, no prisons, and no members of the opposition.

"You are, however, encouraged to shoot Iraqi suffering as a result of UN sanctions. Hospitals, poverty and funerals of those allegedly killed by U.S.- British air strikes are all okay. And you can shoot as many Saddam Hussein statutes and billboards as you like.

"People you speak to on the street say the same things over and over again. 'America and the Jews are out to make war; we have no weapons of mass destruction; Iraqis want peace.' They appear to have no inkling whatsoever of all the heinous acts committed by Iraq's leader, resulting in the death of a million or more of his own people."

Pinchuk speaks Arabic, which no doubt gave her an edge on other reporters, whose interviews were filtered through official translators. For example, during an interview in mid-November with news anchor Lloyd Robertson, Pinchuk reported on the "venomous rhetoric in the mosques" of Baghdad – rhetoric that most other reporters would not be able to understand.

In one case, the imam of a central mosque called for Allah "to destroy the enemies of Iraq – the U.S. and the Jews." These sentiments were then echoed by people in the streets, who told Pinchuk that UN weapons inspectors had been sent to do the bidding of the Americans and the Jews in order to promote war.

What is most revealing is that Pinchuk reported all this – her story on CTV.ca was available to officials in Iraq – not from the safety of Canada, but from Baghdad itself, knowing she might face intimidation or eviction. "The truth always has a way of getting out, even in Baghdad," she said. And she meant it – one of a very small number of reporters ever to have said so.

Both Pinchuk and CTV deserve credit for their forthright, honest and brave coverage of Iraq while it was still under Saddam's control. In virtually all Arab countries, news coverage is held hostage by the governing regime, with Iraq having been the most extreme example. And nearly all news organizations played ball in this charade in order to file their stories, typically ones the regime wanted us to see.

Hebrew U joins forces with Canadian peace centre

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Hebrew University of Jerusalem has forged a joint venture with the relatively new Arthur V. Mauro Centre for Peace and Justice at the University of Manitoba, and to celebrate, U of M's St. Paul's College – which houses the Mauro Centre – and the local chapter of Canadian Friends of Hebrew University are hosting a dinner May 20 in Mauro's honour.

"The Arthur Mauro Centre is committed to promoting the Abrahamic religions – Judaism, Christianity and Islam – as a basis for tolerance, peace and justice in the Middle East and around the world," said Jim Carr, executive director of the Business Council of Manitoba and vice-chair of the centre's board since its inception in September 2001.

Mauro is a graduate of the largely Catholic St. Paul's College. A lawyer by training, his area of specialty was transportation and communications. From 1972 to 1976, he was president and CEO of Transair.

In 1977, he was appointed executive vice-president of the Winnipeg-based Investors Group, one of the largest mutual fund and financial services companies in Canada. Mauro retired in 1985 as chairman and CEO of the company.

He now serves on a number of national and local corporate boards and is well known in Winnipeg's Jewish community. A widower, he recently married high-profile Winnipeg lawyer Naomi Levine.

The Mauro Centre conducts educational, research and outreach programs to promote peace and justice worldwide. Its intiatives include sponsoring international study and exchange programs.

In the fall, under the aegis of the Kanee Lecture Series, the centre brought Jordan's Prince Hassan, the brother of the late King Hussein and the uncle of King Abdullah, to Winnipeg to speak about peace and brotherhood. The presentation attracted about 1,700 people.

The linkage between the Mauro Centre and Hebrew U is a natural one, Carr said. Mauro was inspired to create the centre because of his longstanding friendship with former Hebrew U president Hanoch Gutfreund, who will be attending the dinner.

"It made sense to establish this connection with Israel's leading university given our goals at the centre," Carr said.

The centre's partnership with Hebrew U is expected to include visiting professor exchanges, joint publication of periodicals, joint conferences, student exchanges and the creation of special intensive courses.

Carr said the Mauro Centre is also seeking to link up with an Islamic university, but there is nothing definite yet on that front.

Ha'aretz reported that one woman in her 40s who had returned to Israel from Toronto a few weeks ago was admitted to hospital as a suspected SARS case.

Stanley Morais, Canadian manager of El Al Israel Airlines, said he has fielded several calls from concerned American passengers whose flights to Israel are scheduled to stop in Toronto.

"We explain that the electronic media has really blown [the SARS problem] out of proportion," Morais said, adding most U.S. passengers have chosen not to change their travel plans.

However, Morais said, a small number of Israelis who had planned to come to Toronto have cancelled their visits.

Howard English, director of marketing and communications for UJA Federation of Toronto said two federation-sponsored missions are slated to depart for a two-week visit to Israel on May 4. The Alpha-Omega dental fraternity and a combined Israel Bonds/UJA Federation mission are going ahead as planned, he said.

There was never any consideration of cancelling or postponing either mission, which will bring a total of 35 visitors to Israel, he said.

English acknowledged that some of the UJA's "sister organizations" in Israel, including Keren Hayesod and the Jewish Agency, had e-mailed Toronto inquiring about the extent of the SARS problem here. They seemed reassured when told Toronto had experienced a small number of cases and there was no epidemic, he said.

Participants from Toronto are not withdrawing from the missions, English said, although some have asked him about steps Israel will take when they arrive at Ben Gurion.

Toronto's federation has sent people to Israel "at the worst of times" and will continue to do so, making it the largest single organizer of missions to the Jewish state, he said.

Since the outbreak of the intifadah in late September 2000, the federation has sent 1,500 people to Israel on 33 missions and it will continue to maintain its goal of one mission a month, English said.

Kleinman said visits to Israel seem to be picking up after slowing down due to concerns over the war in Iraq.

Meanwhile, on the domestic front, Karen Garscadden of Up & Coming events, a party-planning company, said none of the weddings and bar mitzvahs she has helped to plan have been cancelled.

However, SARS has affected the events, with almost every one experiencing a small number of cancellations by out-of-town guests or local invitees who work in the medical field, she said.

Anne Mirvish: 62 years with Ed began with blind date

By PHYLLIS SHRAGGE
Hamilton Correspondent

HAMILTON — It was a blind date that neither party really wanted.

Anne Maklin had another date booked for that night back in 1938, and she thought it would be rude to break it. After all, why should she ditch a man for someone she had never met. Who was this Ed Mirvish anyway?

Now, as she looks forward to their 62nd wedding anniversary in June, the decision to go on that blind date was likely the best decision of her life.

"Neither of us wanted to go," Anne Mirvish said in a telephone interview.

A man she had dated a few months previously had asked her to go out with him again when she was to be in Toronto attending a family member's bridal tea.

Two of Anne's friends, however, had another idea.

After an afternoon tea at Diana Sweets Restaurant, one said, "I've got a date for you."

Ed and Anne Mirvish

Anne replied that she already had a date, and anyway she didn't go out on blind dates.

The friend said, "These boys have been taking us out. It would be nice if you would join us."

Anne once again pointed out that she already had a date.

Her friend insisted.

"That's all right for you," the friend said. "You can go back to Hamilton, but we have to live here, and they'll be upset and they might not ask us out again."

Anne didn't want to spoil things for her friends, so she cancelled her date.

Even though she was reluctant to go on that blind date with Ed Mirvish, "the minute we met, we connected."

They dated for 3½ years. During the last year, there was an "understanding" that they would get married.

After almost 62 years of marriage, the Mirvishes recently renewed their wedding vows with 11 other couples who were also married at Hamilton's Temple Anshe Sholom.

The ceremony was one of a number of events marking the 150th anniversary of the temple.

Anne recalls that she was in no hurry to get married.

"We were young, and he had family to support. It was the Depression. I didn't want to get married. I wanted to sing."

Anne, now a renowned sculptor, had a distinguished professional career as a singer at the time. Known as Anne Lazare (her mother's maiden name), she sang on the radio as a teenager on Eaton's Good Deed Radio Club. Well-known conductor/composer Percy Faith, once chose her from among 60 contestants as the most promising female voice in the Hamilton area.

Her prize was the opportunity to sing for two weeks with an orchestra at the Brant Inn in Burlington, at the time a prime locale for successful performers.

The opportunity to advance her singing career resulted in bitter disappointment. Two days later she happened to be walking past the Tivoli Theatre in Hamilton when the theatre manager, Len Bishop, called her over.

Bishop was the unfortunate bearer of bad news. The orchestra leader would not allow Anne to sing because she was Jewish.

"I ran home crying," she said.

Anne grew up in a musical family. Her uncle was a champion Charleston dancer, her grandmother was a singer and her mother played piano. The family loved the theatre, often going to performances at the Grand Opera House on James Street near their home in Hamilton.

Anne recalls seeing her first play at age four. She vividly remembers a frightening scene that kept her from falling asleep that night and many nights after.

"He had never gone to the theatre until he went with me," she said.

Ed and son David have since produced countless theatrical productions in Toronto, many at their own theatres, the Royal Alexandra Theatre and the Princess of Wales Theatre.

"He's a brilliant man. He could go into any kind of business and make it work," Anne said.

From the beginning of their relationship, she was impressed with his character. He was devoted to his family.

"Ed was a good son. A good son, is a good husband," she said.

The Mirvishes' wedding was officiated by the late Rabbi Arthur A. Feldman and took place at the original Temple Anshe Sholom building on Hughson Street.

It was a lovely wedding, Anne said, but there were some problems.

"We couldn't afford a sit-down dinner. It was supposed to be a candlelight wedding. So many things went wrong. It's funny looking back.

"My sister's girlfriend was responsible for lighting the tapers on the altar, but she forgot. I was standing there, looking at these unlit candles.

"I said, under my breath, to the rabbi, 'She forgot to light the candles.' It was so serious to me that they didn't get lit. I guess the theatre was in me at that time too. I wanted it to be dramatic.

"The rabbi said, 'It's too late now.'"

One of the reasons the couple renewed their vows was so they could enjoy some things they were denied at their wedding. They had planned for an orchestra, but they were told the day before that they couldn't have it because it might disturb the peace on a Sunday in the gentile neighbourhood.

"It was ridiculous. The music couldn't be heard with the doors closed."

Anne said she was pleased that there would be a flautist and a harpist at the renewal of the vows reception.

She was eager to carry calla lilies at her wedding, but she was told they were not in season. She was resigned to carrying Easter lilies instead.

At the renewal of the vows service, Anne, wearing a lovely white lace suit and white gloves, walked down the aisle carrying her beloved calla lilies.

France's education system fights anti-Semitism in schools

By ELIAS LEVY
Staff Reporter

There was recently an upheaval in the educational system of France, as a result of changes implemented by the country's education minister, Luc Ferry.

Ferry, Minister of education, youth and research, severely criticized teachers who, as a result of their hostility to the State of Israel, have tolerated flagrant anti-Semitism in their schools.

"A group of leftist teachers who are anti-Israel have increasingly tolerated anti-Semitic remarks because these remarks do not come from those on the extreme right. Some teachers, through a kind of antiglobalization or pro-Palestinian solidarity, are leaving the door open to anti-Semitism," Ferry was quoted as saying in the magazine Libération, Feb. 27.

Ferry decided to directly attack the problem, which is usually somewhat taboo, in French schools. Convinced that the war with Iraq "is inevitably going to revive intercommunity tensions in some establishments," he took steps to strengthen the consequences of racist, anti-Semitic or xenophobic aggression.

He gave strict instructions to have units of "veille et action" (vigilance and action) developed by the ministry. These would provide some 20 mediators who would intervene in schools when necessary.

He recently called a meeting at the ministry of education offices, with 24 heads of educational institutions that are grappling with the problem of anti-Semitism.

When Ferry was in Quebec at the invitation of Quebec education minister Sylvain Simard recently, he spoke to The CJN about these measures he has had his ministry adopt to combat anti-Semitism in schools.

"I want to explain to the Jewish community of Canada what is currently happening in France because, when they see it from afar, people sometimes do not fully understand the French situation," Ferry said.

"The situation today is linked to the fact that we have in France about five million Muslims. The children of these Muslim citizens, who are now in the schools, are the heirs of French colonialists in Algeria, Tunisia and Morocco.

The Israeli-Arab conflict is often imported into France in such a way that the Beurs [young Muslims] begin to think of themselves as Palestinian, while the Jewish youth think of themselves as Israeli. This gives rise to incidents in the academic establishments. What is most important is to realize that this phenomenon has nothing to do with the classic anti-Semitism of the French extreme right."

According to Ferry, author of some 15 books on philosophy, those responsible for education must be very vigilant, because some teachers are too lax when facing anti-Semitic trends, which have continually increased in France in recent years.

"Some leftist and extreme leftist teachers are so sensitive to the Palestinian cause and so hostile to current Israeli policy that they see the young Muslims as victims and excuse their anti-Semitic remarks.

"That is the situation I would absolutely like to prevent. We must clearly tell all these teachers that no matter what the origin of anti-Semitic or racist acts or comments – because unfortunately, there is certainly racism in France – we must severely punish those who commit such intolerable acts. We must also remind these young people of the secular principles of the French Republic."

Does the outbreak of anti-Semitism in France in recent years, since the beginning of the second intifadah in the fall of 2000, worry Ferry?

"There has not been an increase in anti-Semitism in France," he said. "On the other hand, we are very aware that the Israeli-Palestinian conflict may lead to crisis situations in the schools. We must not tolerate anti-Semitism on the grounds that it is no longer the classic anti-Semitism of the extreme right and that this vile scourge might be more acceptable because it comes from people who are sensitive to the Palestinian cause."

Ferry strongly opposes the phenomenon of "communautarisme" (being concerned only with one's own world and living at the edge of society), which he said is the opposite of democratic republican secularism.

"Communautarisme has perverse social and national effects. For 15 years, we have been living with a disturbing communautarist trend. The struggle for minority rights or the principle of "positive discrimination" that appeared about 20 years ago in Canada and the United States runs counter to the republican principles on which French schools are based. We have taken steps to remind all students and teachers in France of those secular, republican principles," Ferry said.

"מר גרשוני זכה בפרס ישראל הממומן מכספי המיסים. הוא רוצה את הכסף, אבל מסרב לבוא לקבל אותו מידי נציגי הממשלה הנבחרת. מר גרשוני לא רק מתגלה כאדם חסר תרבות ונימוס, אלא גם כמי שבז לחלוק הדמוקרטי ולחופש חבחירה של האזרח הישראלי שמימן לו את הפרס....אם נניח היה מסרב לקבל את הפרס באקט מתאה חירואי, מן הראוי היה להצדיע לו. מאידך, רצונו הפרדוקסלי גם לקחת את הכסף וגם להתנפש לצ'ה גווארה הוא לא רק מגושם, אלא חצוף....."

Kosher Gourmet Gala raises $102,000

More than 700 people savoured delicious samplings from some of Toronto's top kosher caterers, wine importers, hotels, and cake and confectionary creators, at Mazon Canada's fifth annual Kosher Gourmet Gala, held recently at Roy Thomson Hall.

Mazon Canada, founded in 1986, raises money and distributes it to Canadian hunger relief organizations such as food banks, children's breakfast clubs, community kitchens and Out of the Cold shelters.

Funds are raised through annual community events such as the gala in Toronto and the Kosher Food Fest in Montreal, as well as through the sale of all-occasion cards, and holiday appeals.

Jacqueline Kott-Wolle, executive director of Mazon Canada said that this year's gala grossed $102,000, up by $17,000 from last year.

Gala chair Susan Davis, said, "We're thrilled that the gala has been received so well. The food was scrumptious, the atmosphere was charged and the decor was elegant.

"At the same time, caterers and guests alike contributed to the hungry in communities across the country. It's a win-win situation."

Following are some of the gala recipes:

Bring 6 cups salted water to a boil. Add the peas and simmer until bright green, about 1 minute. Drain and set aside. Sprinkle Sichuan pepper on both sides of the salmon fillet, distributing evenly. In a wide non-stick frying pan large enough to hold the salmon in a single layer, warm the corn oil and sesame oil over medium heat. Place the salmon fillets in the pan so they do not touch each other and cook until lightly golden on one side, about 4 minutes. Turn, season with salt and continue to cook until lightly golden on the second side and opaque throughout when pierced with a knife, about 4 minutes longer. Transfer the salmon to individual plates and cover loosely with foil to keep warm.

Mitzna resigns as Labor Party chief

By NAOMI SEGAL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — Israel's Labor Party, already in shambles since its stinging defeat in the general elections earlier this year, became even more unsettled this week with the announcement by Amram Mitzna that he is stepping down as party leader.

At a news conference Sunday, the dovish Mitzna, the former mayor of Haifa, blamed infighting and backstabbing by senior party officials for his decision.

Mitzna, 58, said these officials, whom he did not name, pursued their personal interests instead of party interests.

"There were people in the party who said everything they could to hurt me. They put their personal interests before those of the party, even during the general elections."

In those elections, held in late January, the Mitzna-led Labor Party made its worst showing in Israel's 55-year history, winning only 19 seats in the country's 120-seat Knesset.

Most commentators said Mitzna lost so badly because his policies were too dovish for an Israeli electorate hardened by more than two years of almost-daily clashes with the Palestinians.

During the campaign, Mitzna said he would be willing to negotiate with the Palestinians without a ceasefire and would talk with any Palestinian leader, including Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat.

If negotiations failed to produce an agreement, he said, Israel would withdraw unilaterally from most of the West Bank within a year. Mitzna also pledged to uproot Israeli communities in Gaza immediately upon taking office.

It was unclear who would take over for Mitzna.

Mitzna and party secretary Ophir Pines agreed to convene party organizations within 10 days to discuss whether new primaries would be held or a temporary leader appointed.

Mitzna's move was not altogether unexpected. Since Labor's electoral defeat in the recent polls, political analysts had predicted Mitzna might step down.

He told reporters he was prepared to fight for his dovish views, but not to fight daily to prove his legitimacy as party leader.

The former Haifa mayor entered national politics six months ago, after ousting former Labor head Benjamin Ben-Eliezer in a November primary.

But their rivalry did not end there. Ben-Eliezer, more of a centrist than Mitzna, still used his influence in various party bodies to block or encumber decisions Mitzna tried to put through.

His tenure as Haifa mayor is generally considered to have been successful – the city is seen as a model for Arab-Jewish coexistence.

Int'l solidarity members met British terrorists

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — The two British terrorists involved in last week's suicide bombing of a Tel Aviv bar met at the end of April with activists from the pro-Palestinian International Solidarity Movement (ISM) in the Gaza Strip town of Rafah, a member of the movement said Monday.

Three people were killed and scores wounded in the bombing at the beachfront Mike's Place bar, when one of the Britons, Asif Hanif, blew himself up at the crowded nightspot. The bomb carried by Omar Sharif, the second Briton, did not detonate, and he fled the scene.

ISM member Raphael Cohen told a news conference Monday that he met the two men on Friday, April 25, five days before the bombing. He said that a group of 15 people met in an apartment in Rafah that belongs to the movement.

Along with four Britons from London, who planned to establish a summer camp in Gaza, the meeting included three Italians and the two bombers. Cohen said that he and another five ISM members attended the meeting, in which tea was served and general questions were asked about the participants' identities and plans in Rafah.

Cohen said that the two Britons answered that they did not belong to any particular groups, but rather were "alternative tourists" in the territories. He said that the ISM members were at the apartment for 15 minutes before leaving for a memorial ceremony for the ISM's Rachel Corrie of the United States, who was run over and killed in March by an Israel Defence Forces bulldozer in Gaza. (The ISM said the driver ran over her deliberately. The IDF denied the accusation and did not indict the driver.)

In recent months, the two Britons were students in Damascus, where it appears they were recruited by one of the terror groups in the Syrian capital.

A few weeks before the bombing, they crossed from Jordan via the Allenby Bridge border crossing. As far as is known, they were not detained or questioned. Among their possessions were explosives which, according to Defence Minister Shaul Mofaz, were concealed in a copy of the Koran.

According to the London Times, the two lived in a Tel Aviv hostel before traveling to the Gaza Strip. On arriving in Gaza, they made contact with local terror cells, and felt safe enough to cross back into Israel at least one more time. On crossing the Erez checkpoint, they did not raise any suspicions of security personnel.

After the Tel Aviv bombing, Israel announced that from now on it will bar pro-Palestinian activists from entering the country and will try to expel at least some of the dozens of activists who are already here, according a new plan drafted by the Israel Defense Forces and the foreign and defence ministries.

Most of the activists, who come from Europe, Canada and the United States, belong to the ISM.

Their goal is to act as "human shields" for Palestinian individuals and houses during IDF incursions into Palestinian towns, and they have often been involved in confrontations with IDF soldiers. They also try to help Palestinians pass through IDF roadblocks.

Besides Corrie, there have been two other recent cases in which international activists have been seriously injured by IDF gunfire during confrontations in the territories.

In the first sign of the new crackdown, a member of the ISM was detained last Thursday by Israeli troops in the southern Gaza refugee camp Rafah.

Military sources said the female activist was sleeping in a house that was slated for demolition and suspected of concealing one of the tunnels used to smuggle arms from nearby Egypt, and her case was being handled by the Foreign Ministry.

The woman was later released and allowed to remain in the country, though she was barred from returning to Gaza.

The IDF charges that many of the self-proclaimed peace activists are "provocateurs" and "riot inciters" who deliberately interfere with the IDF's work, with the goal of blackening Israel's image.

Army sources said that in one case, they discovered a wanted terrorist being hidden by ISM activists in Jenin.

The sources said the activists received training overseas in how to deceive border control officials at Ben-Gurion International Airport in order to be allowed into the country.

Furthermore, both the army and the Foreign Ministry fear that additional foreign citizens might be killed or wounded by the IDF if the ISM's activities are allowed to continue.

Last Wednesday's bombing in Tel Aviv added a new reason to the authorities' desire to clamp down on the foreign activists – fear that other terrorists from overseas might enter Israel under the guise of peace activists.

IDF and Foreign Ministry last week decided to instruct border control officials at Ben-Gurion and land crossings with Egypt and Jordan to bar foreign activists. As well, IDF officers who encounter such activists in closed military areas will be ordered to arrest them, after which they will be deported.

Survivors, students join together on 2003 March of the Living

By LISA PETERS AND ELI RUBENSTEIN

OSCWIESEM — What the March of the Living meant to more than 3,000 young people – teens and young adults from around the world – can be summed up in one word: "Remembering."

April 29 – the day of three-kilometre "March of the Living" from Auschwitz to Birkenau – was a day many will never forget. More than 100 students and adults from Montreal and Toronto took part in the 2003 march, which consisted of a week-long journey to Poland followed by a week in Israel.

Ralph Lipper, national chair of the march, said it "creates a unique understanding of prewar Jewish life, the horror of the Holocaust and the creation of the State of Israel."

The impact of the march on both its student participants and Holocaust survivors was evident in their passion, tears and thoughts.

Faigie Libman, a survivor from Lithuania who accompanied the Toronto contingent, said she was uplifted by the students who joined her on the trip.

"I felt more than I ever expected to because of these young people. They wrapped me in their love, and I now feel as though I have 30 new grandchildren."

She continued, "A fellow survivor on this trip told me the last words of her family were, 'men vet unzer nit fargessen' – that they should never be forgotten. I feel we are in very good hands with these young people. They will definitely continue the legacy of remembrance."

Ernest Ehrmann and his wife Ella of Montreal (they're originally from Hungary) were joined on the march by their daughters Audrey and Debbie. The elder Ehrmanns were held in Birkenau as teenagers and lost many family members, including their parents, in the camp.

"As a survivor, I am very impressed with these young adults on the march," Ehrmann said. "My wish is that they will have their own families and will tell their children about what they have seen. I hope they will bring their own children on the march one day."

"Let's face it, survivors will only be around for the next 10-15 years," he continued. "When I was first asked to go on the march, they said, 'There are not that many survivors who are healthy enough to make this trip.' It really got to me," he said, as he touched his heart.

Besides their visit to Auschwitz-Birkenau, the students also visited Cracow, Warsaw and Lublin, as well as other cities and towns in Poland that were once centres of Jewish life and learning.

These visits create a balance between the pain of visiting the camps and the joy of celebrating the vibrant Jewish life that once existed in prewar Europe.

After visiting the synagogue in the small village of Tykochen in northeastern Poland, Lori Merling of Montreal was moved by the beauty of the handpainted prayers that adorned the walls.

"It is truly magnificent. Being inside the synagogue, I can feel the Jewish souls of the past come alive again," Merling said.

"The marchers are here to be part of a rich and beautiful tradition," said Rabbi Reuben Poupko of Montreal. "We don't come here for vengeance. We come here to simply thank God that we have survived and try to make our lives worthy of that triumph."

After the March of the Living, many of the young participants planted memorial plaques inscribed with personal messages in the fields of Birkenau.

Jen Gewurz of Montreal wrote: "Peace comes once society begins to learn from its history… Hopefully this genocide that took place can help society grow and suspend its hateful nature."

In addition to Auschwitz-Birkenau, the students also visited the death camps Treblinka and Majdanek.

Majdanek's relatively untouched barracks, gas chambers and crematoria proved a painful experience for many of the young people.

After Grade 11 student Sean Burnstein of Montreal witnessed the horrors of Majdanek death camp, he uttered, "We must not hold our heads down and cry. We have to raise our heads up because that's what those in the camps would have wanted."

Majdanek also weighed heavily on the minds of the Toronto participants, as Adir Koschitzky of Toronto observed:

"In Majdanek, there was one moment that struck me harder than any other. I was in the gas chamber, [and] I looked around and saw that again there were Jews from many countries together. But this time it was to commemorate the memory of those who died there 60 years ago."

Ariella Mandel of Montreal commented: "We have to see it. Generations of the Holocaust won't be here forever."

Ted Bolgar, a survivor of Birkenau who now lives in Montreal (he is originally from Hungary) and lost his mother and sister at the death camp, agreed.

"These kids have seen movies, read books and heard stories, but nothing can compare to the feeling they get when the see the dome of human ashes at the Majdanek death camp."

He added tearfully, "What I want the kids on the march to remember is something I once read on a plaque: 'We have to remember, because our memories are their only grave.'"

Zundel closer to deportation

The latest chapter in Zundel's legal tribulations began in mid-February when American immigration officials sent him back to Canada for overstaying a visitor's visa. Zundel had immigrated to Canada in 1958 but had never obtained Canadian citizenship. He moved to the United States in 2000, saying he was severing his ties to Canada.

On his return, he immediately made a claim for refugee status, a step that infuriated Jewish groups and politicians alike.

Canadian Jewish organizations applauded the government's latest steps to remove Zundel. "This man has been sullying our shores long enough," said Keith Landy, national president of Canadian Jewish Congress.

"While Ernst Zundel may not have been actually wielding the stick, he has provided oxygen to various white supremacist factions in their promotion of hate and anti-Semitism throughout the world," added Bernie Farber, Ontario region executive director for Congress.

Doug Christie, who is representing Zundel, told the Globe and Mail, "This is a frivolous, political hate campaign by the minister [of immigration] against someone whose opinions he doesn't like… There is no evidence whatsoever that Ernst Zundel ever caused a threat to the security of Canada, unless having a dissenting opinion is a threat to Canada."

Meanwhile, Zundel's Web site, which a human rights tribunal has ruled vilified Jews, continued its anti-Semitic themes, this time in a "Zgram" posted from the maximum detention cell in Niagara Falls where he is being held.

Zundel, who calls himself the "Gandhi of the right," claimed he was being persecuted by the Canadian state, "which, regardless of the party in power, always was willing to pimp for Jewish interests."

He claimed Canada's Anglo-Saxon Common Law has been "dumped by Canada's prewar and postwar invaders, the Marxist riffraff of the ghettos of Europe. What we have increasingly in its place is ghetto and Talmud thinking, Marxist situational ethics or even lack of ethics, repeated by a dumbed down, mentally lethargic sensational-headline-constipated populace."

He goes on to say the German population suffered postwar repercussions that "were murderous and almost genocidal," perpetrated "by those Talmudists like [wartime U.S. administration policy-makers] Morgenthau and Roosevelt."

'Road map' highlights

GOALS:

• A "final and comprehensive settlement of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict by 2005."

• The settlement will include "an independent, democratic and viable Palestinian state living side by side in peace and security with Israel."

• An "end to the occupation that began in 1967," when Israel captured the West Bank, Gaza Strip and eastern Jerusalem from Jordan. The Palestinians demand the land for their state, but Israel wants at least minor adjustments to the borders, if not more. The plan does not mention specifically what final borders should be.

EVALUATION:

• "The Quartet" – the United States, United Nations, European Union and Russia – "will meet regularly at senior levels to evaluate the parties' performance."

PHASE I:

The Palestinian Authority must:

• Issue an "unequivocal statement reiterating Israel's right to exist in peace and security and calling for an immediate and unconditional ceasefire," ending attacks against "Israelis anywhere."

• "Undertake visible efforts on the ground to arrest, disrupt and restrain individuals and groups" conducting or planning terror attacks.

• Dismantle "terrorist capabilities and infrastructure" and confiscate illegal weapons.

• End all incitement against Israel.

• Consolidate existing security organizations into three, under the control of the PA interior minister.

• Hold free, open and fair elections.

Israel must:

• Issue an "unequivocal statement affirming its commitment to the two-state vision of an independent, viable, sovereign Palestinian state" and "calling for an immediate end to violence against Palestinians anywhere."

• Freeze all construction in Jewish communities in the West Bank and Gaza Strip.

• Immediately dismantle illegal outposts built since March 2001.

• Stop demolishing terrorists' homes.

• Withdraw its army from PA areas reoccupied since the intifadah began in September 2000.

PHASE II (to start as early as end of 2003):

• Israel moves to "enhance maximum territorial contiguity" for the Palestinians.

• Palestinian constitution is ratified.

• An international conference launches the process leading to the establishment of a Palestinian state with provisional borders.

• Quartet members will promote international recognition of the Palestinian state and UN membership.

PHASE III (2004-2005):

• A second international conference will finalize a peace agreement that allows for a Palestinian state in 2005. The agreement will settle issues such as borders, Jerusalem, refugees, settlements and peace between Israel and other Arab states.

• Resolution of the refugee issue must be "agreed, just, fair and realistic."

April 28

• Israeli intelligence reportedly gave U.S. forces in Iraq the first tip on the whereabouts of PoW Jessica Lynch. Contradicting earlier reports that an Iraqi civilian tipped off U.S. forces, U.S. congressman Tom Lantos said Israeli intelligence provided the first information that Lynch and five colleagues were being held in a Nasiriyah hospital.

April 29

• An army officer was killed in a training accident when a tank accidentally backed up into the jeep he was sitting in.

April 30

• The man who carried out a suicide bombing at a Tel Aviv beachfront pub was a British citizen, as was an additional terrorist who managed to flee when his explosive device did not detonate. Three people were killed and at least 35 wounded, one critically, when a suicide bomber blew himself up in the early morning at a beachfront pub in Tel Aviv. Israel is investigating whether Hezbollah or Al Qaeda are linked to the attack.

May 1

• At least 18 Palestinians were killed in clashes with Israeli troops in the West Bank and Gaza. Seven Israeli soldiers were wounded during a large-scale operation that began Wednesday night.

May 2

• Negotiating teams from the Histadrut labour federation and the Finance Ministry met to discuss the government's emergency economic plan and the union's strike action, which crippled the country for two days earlier in the week. The labour federation launched the strike to protest proposed cuts of $2.3 billion (US) that Finance Minister Benjamin Netanyahu said are essential to reining in the budget deficit and preventing the economy from collapsing.

We are all one big family

On the 55th Independence Day of the State of Israel, we are still fighting for the basic issues in the life of the nation and the country: the struggle for the status of the capital of Israel is continuing; our main border in the east has not yet been determined; we are still combating Palestinian terrorism and Arab countries and organizations are still calling for the destruction of Israel.

The security situation is influencing the economic and social conditions. Nevertheless, despite the difficult challenges we are facing, on Independence Day, we are proud of the great achievements made. We have a sovereign, democratic, Jewish, liberal, developed and progressive country with international achievements in science, agriculture, technology and culture. We have a country that succeeds in providing its citizens with health, education and housing services, a country, that continues to absorb Jewish immigrants from all over the world, a state that has become a model and example to be emulated by many other countries in the world.

I feel that recently the people of Israel have become more united than in the past. The tension between the various sectors in Israeli society has lessened. I also feel a great rise in the solidarity expressed by the Jewish people in the Diaspora towards Israel. Many leaders of world Jewry have been visiting Israel and a large number of Jewish communities have sent solidarity missions this past year. These visits strengthen our relations and contribute to mutual enrichment.

The free world's campaign to eliminate international terrorism is of great necessity. The fear in the hearts of humanity must be eradicated. Human beings have a basic right to live without fear of terror.

We are all one big family. We all have the same destiny and tradition. We can be proud to belong to the Jewish people.

May every one have a happy Independence Day and may we see the fulfillment of all our national and sovereign aims. I wish the Jewish people and the State of Israel quiet and tranquility, peace and security, economic stability and social justice.

Yours sincerely,
Moshe Katsav,
President, State of Israel

Future of Jewish people rests on our combined shoulders

On the occasion of Yom Ha'atzmaut, it is my great pleasure and privilege to send you greetings from Jerusalem, the eternal and undivided capital of the State of Israel and the Jewish people.

Fifty-five years ago, the State of Israel was forged in struggle. Since then, we have built an independent Jewish democracy, making great strides in fields such as medicine, technology, agriculture and the arts while simultaneously fighting for our existence. Our cities have flourished, and we have absorbed millions of immigrants – from 102 countries – who conduct their lives in Hebrew, the ancient language of the Bible. From these accomplishments we derive the strength and resilience to persevere, even in the face of challenge and adversity.

The future of the Jewish people rests on our combined shoulders. With our common history, heritage and mission as our guide, we are certain to achieve even greater heights in the future.

I call upon each of you to personally take part in the Zionist enterprise – by making aliyah and joining us here. Aliyah is vital to the continued existence, growth and prosperity of Israel.

Together, we will succeed in bringing peace and security to our nation and homeland.

Mazal Tov and Chag Samayach.

Prime Minister,
State of Israel

Palestinian Media Watch

The Abbas doctrine

Official Palestinian Authority (PA) TV has broadcast a music video calling for the murder of Jews in the disputed territories, even showing scenes of Jewish teenage girls and a Jewish couple being targeted for death.

The music video shows scenes of masked gunmen firing automatic rifles, aerial views of Jewish towns and, as mentioned, Jews who are targeted for murder: a man walking with his wife, a group of teenage girls and a soldier.

The words that repeat throughout the music video, in Arabic, are:

"From the mountain of fire [Nablus] came the rebels…

Everywhere there are settlements.

Oh brave Nablus, keep the cauldron ablaze.

Pour over the settlements great flames.

Foreigners have no place on this land.

Foreigners have no place where shahids [martyrs for Allah] were killed."

It is interesting that the PA has chosen to broadcast this call to murder Jews in the disputed territories around the very time it has confirmed Mahmoud Abbas as its prime minister.

In a recent interview, Abbas legitimized the murdering of Israelis who live in the disputed territories.

"The intifadah must continue. And it is the right of the Palestinian people to rise and to use all means at their disposal… all means, even guns," he said (A-Sharq Al Awsat, March 3, 2003).

It may be that this week's public call in the media to murder Jews is the PA 's way of reassuring its people that in spite of Western demands to solve disputes through negotiations, the PA continues to follow the Abbas doctrine, seeing murder as a legitimate tool.

Indeed, according to poll results reported last month in the official PA daily Al Hayat Al Jadida, Palestinians in the West Bank and Gaza seem to have accepted the Abbas doctrine, with 90 per cent supporting the murder of Jews in the disputed territories.

Paris to host UNESCO conference on anti-Semitism

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

The city of Paris, the epicentre of a two-year surge of European anti-Semitic violence and harassment, will be the scene of an international conference from May 12-14 that will examine "the case of resurgent anti-Semitism."

Sponsored by UNESCO, the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization, and staged by the Simon Wiesenthal Center, the program will include a keynote address by French Interior Minister Nicolas Sarkozy and a concluding reception hosted by Paris Mayor Bertrand Delanoe.

Holding the conference in Paris, UNESCO's home base, as part of a UN program will emphasize the important role France and the UN agency can play in addressing the recent growth in anti-Jewish incidents, said Leo Adler, the centre's Canadian representative.

The fact that both the government of France and UNESCO "are making it a priority and a major conference is a sign of hope," he said. What's more, the conference affords the opportunity "to get them educated" about the extent of the problem, he added.

Since the onset of the latest Palestinian intifadah in late September 2000, the Jewish community in France has been the target of more than 1,300 hate crimes and incidents. As recently as late March, two young Jews were severely beaten by mobs at an anti-war demonstration in Paris and the next day, a chassidic rabbinic student was attacked in broad daylight on one of Berlin's main streets.

Last month, 95-year-old Simon Wiesenthal, in announcing his retirement, stated that "there is more anti-Semitism today than we experienced in the 1930s."

French government officials have been criticized by the Wiesenthal Center and other observers for downplaying the seriousness of the problem.

Adler said the government's attitude seems to have changed. While a shooting attack on a Jewish school bus was once considered a mere case of vandalism, today it would likely be seen as a serious incident of anti-Semitism, he said.

"Last year's election with [Jean-Marie] Le Pen coming in second I think was a wake-up call to the French and with the new government, now they're aware of the problem taking place. Their participation in this conference is a strong signal that they see the problem for what it is," Adler said.

The Wiesenthal Center is hoping the conference will also have an impact on European public opinion and influence the UN agency itself. The conference will address how "many countries blindly follow Arab and Muslim blocs in terms of voting on Israel and we will deal with how anti-Israel criticism morphs into anti-Semitism."

Ultimately, Adler continued, the conference will "speak to the UNESCO bureaucrats and show them they may not recognize anti-Semitism when they see it and that they may be promoting it without knowing it."

Convincing them "will be a tough nut to crack, but you've got to try."

Adler, who will lead a 12-person Canadian contingent to the conference, said his long-term hope is that a change in attitude at UNESCO might filter down to the various agencies it funds and supports.

Staging a conference in France will also serve as "a concrete gesture of solidarity with the beleaguered Jewish communities of Western Europe," said a Wiesenthal Center news release.

The conference is the first of its kind since one 11 years ago at which UNESCO acknowledged that anti-Semitism was "racism directed against Jews."

Opposition mounts to new Ashkenazi chief rabbi

By NAOMI SEGAL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — Israel's new Ashkenazi chief rabbi is facing growing calls to step down amid allegations of misconduct.

The allegations centre on sexual harassment charges against Rabbi Yona Metzger, as well as charges that he engaged in fraud and is not qualified for the post.

Aides to Rabbi Metzger have rejected the allegations as a smear campaign fuelled by political rivals.

Rabbi Metzger and his Sephardi counterpart, Rabbi Shlomo Amar, were elected as Israel's chief rabbis April 14 by a 150-member public committee.

Since then, however, opposition to Rabbi Metzger has grown. In the latest development, a Tel Aviv accountant filed a petition last week in the High Court of Justice challenging Rabbi Metzger's appointment. It will be heard by a three-judge panel.

The petition claims that allegations of fraud and other improprieties involving Rabbi Metzger were not fully investigated because of his 1998 pledge not to stand for chief rabbi of Tel Aviv.

Rabbi Metzger's spokesperson, Roni Rimon, told Ma'ariv the petition was full of "lies, lies and more lies" produced by "professional slanderers."

Rabbi Metzger had been accused of forging witnesses' signatures on marriage contracts and unlawfully demanding payment for performing weddings, Ha'aretz reported.

As a result of the allegations, Rabbi Metzger's permit to serve as a chief rabbi of a major city was revoked. However, it was reinstated several months later after a hearing before three senior Israeli rabbis – including Eliyahu Bakshi-Doron, a former Sephardi chief rabbi – who accepted his explanations and his commitment to leave the Tel Aviv race, the paper said.

The petition also argues that Rabbi Metzger, 50, who was previously rabbi of north Tel Aviv, was not qualified to fill the chief rabbi's duties as head of the country's rabbinic court system because he never had been a religious judge or rabbi of a major city.

The petition maintains the elections committee for the chief rabbi was not adequately informed of the misconduct allegations against Rabbi Metzger.

Rabbi Yona Metzger

In a related development, Ma'ariv recently published what it said were sexual harassment allegations involving Rabbi Metzger.

Aides to Rabbi Metzger categorically denied the allegations, pointing to polygraph tests the rabbi took dispelling them.

Rabbi Metzger's aides accused "well-known rabbinical sources" who they said were stooping low "after earlier accusations of chasing women failed."

The controversy comes against the backdrop of the contested election that preceded Rabbi Metzger's appointment to the post.

A few hours before the vote, Israel's attorney general unsuccessfully asked the elections board to disqualify Rabbi Metzger because of new information he had received.

Rabbi Metzger then scored an upset victory over National Religious Party candidate Rabbi Ya'acov Ariel, who had been favoured to win.

Rabbi Metzger was supported by the non-Chasidic segment of the haredi community, led by Rabbi Yosef Shalom Elyashiv.

In the wake of the renewed allegations against Rabbi Metzger, the head of the Knesset's legislative affairs committee, Likud MK Michael Eitan, called on the attorney general to order an immediate investigation.

Meretz legislator Roman Bronfman called on Rabbi Metzger to suspend himself from his duties until the matter is clarified.

But Shinui legislator Ilan Shalgi countered that as long as the allegations are not proven and no charges are filed, there is no reason for Rabbi Metzger to refrain from acting as chief rabbi.

Support group launched for Jewish amputees

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

Chazak v'ematz – Be strong and of good courage. This is the way Jews traditionally encourage each other.

Ruth, who for privacy reasons wishes to have only her first name used here, also considers this an appropriate name for a support group for Jewish amputees, who, she says, need to be helped to realize that they can still be productive members of the community.

Ruth, who lost her leg to osteosarcoma, bone cancer, three years ago, follows that philosophy herself. "I'm always going and doing," she said in a recent interview, listing an array of activities that include going to exercise classes at the Barbara Frum Library, learning to use a computer (even practising video games), visiting amputees in hospital and working with L'Chaim, a support group for Jewish women with cancer.

Ruth didn't always feel that way. She recalled going to the cemetery when her leg, according to Jewish law, was buried. "I felt so alone, and I wanted to meet other people like me."

Now, she said, "I feel responsible to help others going through the same thing."

She approached Jewish Family & Child Service in the fall of 2001 about starting a support group. The agency agreed to do this on a trial basis, but after a few meetings, organizers felt there was not enough interest to continue.

That didn't stop Ruth. She is now organizing another group, tentatively called Chazak V'Ematz, which she hopes will be successful. "I feel that there is a real need for something like this."

She and three others met at the Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care in December. "We exchanged ideas, and talked about what life is like for us. Everyone liked it a lot, and wants to meet again."

A viable group would be eight or 10 people, Ruth feels. She has put notices in shul bulletins, and talked to rabbis, asking them to contact congregants who might be interested.

In addition to supporting each other, the group will exchange knowledge and find out about anything new in the field, such as free programs, new technologies and special tax benefits for people with disabilities.

"There is a lot out there to help amputees, but you only find out about [these things] from other people," she said.

She would also like the opportunity to visit or have others in the group visit people who have recently had an amputation, and give them support, information and encouragement.

She said she knows of amputees in other cities who are interested in such a group – in Montreal, Ottawa, Vancouver and some U.S. cities. "The idea is to spread it through the whole [Jewish] community."

Another project she is involved in is trying to persuade the government to give amputees their own meeting place, something like Sunnybrook Hospital's Wellsprings, for general cancer patients.

While she considers herself a private person and shuns the limelight, she said she has come forward because she feels so strongly about this support group and because she is seeking people who will help organize and operate Chazak V'Ematz.

Keeping busy isn't only a way to pass the time and keep her spirits up, she said. "It makes me feel like a better person. I can still serve God and do good for people."

Greater scrutiny of public curatorship urged

Public curatorship in Canada requires greater external scrutiny to avoid the problems that have occurred over the last 25 years, a recent conference on elder abuse was told.

Ura Greenbaum, executive director of the Montreal-based Association for the Defence of Persons and Property under Public Curatorship, said that there has been "persistent and widespread abuse" by public curators, or guardians, as they are known in some provinces, that has come to light in inquiries.

Greenbaum, and Harvey Freedman, a researcher with the association, were presenters at the recent Quebec Conference on Elder Abuse: A Collective Response, organized by CLSC René-Cassin's Foundation for Vital Aging. About 500 delegates registered for the two-day conference, which examined the various types of abuse of the elderly and how it may be prevented.

"Despite public guardians exercising imperial powers over so many seniors and their property, the relationship between public guardians and elder abuse has been given, scant attention in Canada," Greenbaum said. Moreover, public guardians conduct their work "outside public view, hidden behind confidentiality laws."

The public curator, a state agency, steps in to look after personal and financial affairs when a person of any age is judged by a court to be not mentally competent to make decisions for him or herself and has no relative or close acquaintance to do it for them.

Greenbaum noted that internal auditing of public curatorship agencies, with a few exceptions, rarely uncover wrongdoing. "The full scope and gravity of maltreatment by public guardians was exposed only by outside examiners."

Greenbaum said scrapping public guardianship is too drastic a solution, but its structure needs to be studied and debated publicly.

While guardianship is intended to protect the most vulnerable and their property, Greenbaum said its gravity should not be underestimated. The person is, effectively, having his or her basic rights removed and transferred to a government body.

In Quebec, 10,654 people were under public curatorship in 2000/2001. In Ontario, it was almost 9,000, and, in British Columbia, 3,500. The largest proportion were seniors.

In Quebec, the Public Curator was the subject of a 1997 investigation by the provincial ombudsman. The auditors-general in Ontario and B.C. have also issued reports revealing deficiencies in these province's public guardianship institutions, Greenbaum said.

Date flicks for the 20-something crowd

By JOSEPH SERGE
Arts Editor

The CJN continues its coverage of the Toronto Jewish Film Festival. All screenings are at the Bloor Cinema, 506 Bloor St. W. [416-324-9121]

Fans of Sex In The City will enjoy Amy's Orgasm, a funny relationship tale that's told from a neurotic woman's point of view.

Amy Mandell is the author of a best-selling self-help book called Why Love Doesn't Work, about women being complete without men.

Julie Davis stars in Amy's Orgasm

She's young, attractive, rich and single – a reluctant feminist icon with a fear of sex and relationships.

Seeking counselling herself, she confides in a Catholic priest at a confessional, even though she's Jewish, because it's "free and anonymous."

But things change when she appears on a Howard Stern-like radio show and falls in love with the "shock-jock" host, a crude, loud-mouth mysogynist – the sort of man she urges her readers to stay away from.

Amy's Orgasm stars the movie's writer and director, Julie Davis. The film's Seinfeld-like humour will appeal to 20-somethings.

Amy's Orgasm runs May 10 at 9:15 p.m. Davis will be in attendance.

* * *

Appealing to the same demographic as Amy's Orgasm is A Match Made in Seven, a documentary that centres around Vancouver's first-ever "speed dating" event.

The idea behind speed dating is to bring together a group of single Jewish people in a café and have them meet with seven randomly chosen singles of the opposite sex for seven minutes.

Ideally, it's hoped that in a Jewish-singles-starved city such as Vancouver, lifelong partners can be found.

At the end of the evening, participants decide which – if any – people they would like to meet again. If there are matches, phone numbers are exchanged and regular dates arranged.

It's not proven whether the concept behind speed dating works, although it has become very popular throughout North America. Alas, in this documentary, none of the singles find their bashert.

However, it is a fast-paced and interesting film that provides voyeurs a window into the thoughts and dating skills of some Jewish singles. (A word of advice to single Jewish men: few women are impressed when all you talk about is cars.)

A Match Made In Seven will be shown May 10 at 11:30 p.m. Director Ilan Saragosti will be in attendance. Following the screening, a SpeedDating Event will take place. For details on this see www.socialscene.ca or call 416-499-2399.

Jewish action hero battles evil Santa

By DAVE GORDON
Special to The CJN

The CJN continues its coverage of the Toronto Jewish Film Festival. All screenings are at the Bloor Cinema, 506 Bloor St. W. [416-324-9121].

Who's the baddest Hebe this side of Tel Aviv? Why it's the Hebrew Hammer, of course. Oozing distinctive and stylish coolness, he's the big screen's first Jewish action hero, and he's come straight from the 'chood. He doesn't need a cape or superpowers; he's got his tfillin grappling hook and a whole lotta attitude.

Adam Goldberg (A Beautiful Mind and Saving Private Ryan) plays the savvy, black-leather-coat wearing, fedora-sporting Hammer, who's velvety smooth on the outside, but compulsively neurotic on the inside.

The Hammer's mission brings him to the North Pole, where reindeers Rudolph and Vixen commit Santacide, a wild conspiracy that leaves Santa's psychotic son Damian (Andy Dick) as heir to the sleigh.

A writer's brush with fame and fortune

The TJFF, Trailers and I

By TAMMY STONE
Special to The CJN

Last year the Toronto Jewish Film Festival celebrated its 10th anniversary, and it was thought that a trailer – the festival's first – would be an innovative way to celebrate this landmark.

Toronto-based filmmaker David Stein – who has his own production company, Tzimmes Entertainment – was approached. Before long an idea was born: local celebrities would be called upon to say mazel tov to the festival.

Stein pulled some strings to get the trailer made on a shoestring budget, and the result was extraordinary.

"We loved David's trailer and were really impressed with whom he managed to get. It was a terrific cross section of the Jewish and non-Jewish film and television and celebrity industry," says Shlomo Schwartzberg, TJFF's director of programming.

The festival team was delighted to have Stein back at the helm this year, and the feeling was mutual, although he wanted to move away from last year's documentary style.

"I'm accustomed to getting people to talk on camera, I can do that standing on my head … the idea this year was to have a concept," says Stein.

Stein's sometime collaborator, writer Adam Halpern, came up with the idea of building a spot around Eliyahu the Prophet; the TJFF team approved wholeheartedly, and Stein and Halpern hashed out a final – and hilarious – version of Halpern's script.

Which brings us to the film shoot at Leah Posluns theatre. Stein has again managed to bring together a cast and crew with virtually no budget, thanks to his contacts in the industry.

Among them is Derek Rogers, CSC, an accomplished cinematographer who has worked on many popular – and esthetically distinguished – films, from Cube and New Waterford Girl to Cypher, starring Lucy Liu. Today, he works for free.

"David's a friend. And Toronto is so commercially-orientated as a film industry. I think film is supposed to be a community. The Jewish Film Festival is a community, so it's great to be a part of that," says Rogers, who also added, with a smile, that Stein is "a fun guy. Crazy, a great guy."

The scene can be described as controlled chaos. Stein says he's slightly understaffed, but he's not panicked. Around 25 extras and actors are waiting patiently to be called to set; some of them sit on the theatre's plush red seats as though watching a show.

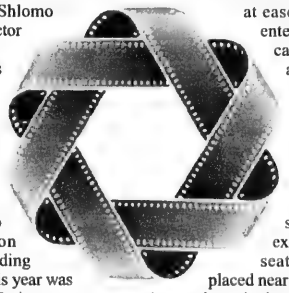
The stage, of course, is not populated by people, but a slew of equipment: lights, gels, tripods, and other things I would need to be more of a techie to name.

For the extras, there's a lot of waiting, either near set or in the lobby. Elizabeth Walker, who's been a member of ACTRA (the actor's union) since 1993, sums it up well. "Bring a book," she says, laughing.

From where Stein sits, there's no rest for the weary, but he handles the pressure with ease and grace. Although he has to shoot the entire spot in one day, he's meticulous, and shoots take after take to make sure he's getting it right.

He tells Rogers at one point, calmly, that he needs a minute, he's "just anguishing over the logic of the space."

With one eye on his monitor and the other on the scene before him, Stein takes time to give his actors quiet one-on-ones when it would be more tactful than yelling in front of a roomful of people. He makes good on his belief that it's vital the actors feel at ease on set. "It's all about entertaining," he says. "You can put people in front of a camera, but if they're not entertaining …"



At noon, I'm stressed just watching Stein work (how will he finish this in only one day?). Then, before I can say "action," I'm suddenly called to set. He needs another extra. I'm corralled into a seat, and people are being placed near me. I feel as though I'm in a real movie theatre, squishing my knees to let others pass by, given real popcorn to hold as a prop.

Reality and fiction are becoming blurred, and I'm loving every minute of it. So are the children extras on set. Some production crew tell them not to eat the popcorn, as most of the bags are filled with Styrofoam, but I catch them sneaking mouthfuls when no one's looking.

My dreams of stardom come crashing down a mere three hours after my first brush with fame. I'm called onto set again, this time with an acting assignment: I have to converse with the people on both sides of me, inaudibly. I think I'm doing a phenomenal job, until Stein tells me, quite kindly, that I'm a little stiff, that I need to be more expressive, but subtly.

Huh? I start to appreciate what a fantastic job the actors with speaking parts are doing. Not to mention Stein, who holds fast to his vision while paying attention to the littlest details.

Stein has been working as a filmmaker for the past eight years, and has worked prolifically as a writer, editor and director. He's made several short films for Bravo!, one of which – Needle and 'Tread' – played at TJFF. His feature-length documentary Wierzbnik: Impressions of a Town That Was, premiered at this festival in 2001, and he has a short video, Khasenjah, at this year's festival.

Heritage Tours to Spain, South America: Renshaw Travel, a major Vancouver travel agency, is helping many Canadian and American Jews discover that their historic and cultural roots go well beyond the obvious travel destinations of Israel and eastern Europe.

Santiago Nemirovsky, the agency's Jewish heritage travel specialist, is an active member of Vancouver's Jewish community. According to the Buenos Aires-born Nemirovsky, who is fluent in English, Spanish, French, Italian and Portuguese, not enough attention is paid to the fact that many Jews have roots in Spain and South America.

"Argentina's Jewish heritage is rooted in the 19th century when the pogroms in Russia and eastern Europe forced Jews to leave," he said. "For eastern European Jews, Argentina's open door immigration policy made it a popular destination during this period of strife and uncertainty. The same is true of Brazil, where the origins of that country's Jewish community are rooted in the Portuguese inquisition and the expulsion of Jews."

Nemirovsky and Renshaw Travel are offering several two-week guided tours of Spain and South America between June and November. Possessing extensive personal knowledge of all the destinations, Nemirovsky is escorting all of the tours.

The South American tour includes a Shabbat in Rio and another in Buenos Aires with dinner with Nemirovsky's family; and visits to the Israel Embassy, the oldest synagogue in the Americas in Recife, the Iguazu Falls, Colonia and Olinda.

In Spain, the tour includes Shabbat with local families in Toledo and Barcelona, walking tours of Jewish historic sites and visits to hidden underground synagogues used during the Inquisition. It also includes visits to Cordoba, Segovia and Girona, and an option to see the Guggenheim Museum Bilbao and San Sebastian.

On the set of TJFF trailer

He often works as producer/editor/director on commercials to earn his living, but now has more freedom to pursue his feature projects. He's currently directing a documentary episode about Mordechai Vanunu as part of a four-part series for History Television called Betrayal, produced by Simcha Jacobovici's company, Associated Producers. The series will air next fall.

His office, in the Bloor West area, is funky, the environment is laidback but humming with life, and Stein has a small but devoted staff.

"At the end of the day, it becomes very collaborative, "says Stein, who shies away from calling himself the boss. "With an independent company that has few resources, we all end up assuming a lot of roles."

Except for Stein, they're all new to film shoot work, but it doesn't show. I ask Barry Lavender, who brilliantly plays Eliyahu, for a prophesy on how it'll all turn out.

He smiles. "If comedy is serious, then that's how they're going about it. It's [going to be] good."

This won't surprise festival organizers.

"We've shown several of David's short films and have been struck by how well made they are and how much heart they have," says Schwartzberg. "He really is one of the city's most talented filmmakers and I anticipate much more arresting work from him in the future."

Hebrew Hammer vs. Santa

Opposing Santa Sr.'s tolerant ways, Damian hatches a plan to obliterate Chanukah. In order to make Chanukah disappear, he needs to sabotage the Jewish Atomic Clock in Israel, which is set to determine the precise times of Yom Kippur, Chanukah and... Macy's Discount Day.

Now it's up to Mordecai Jefferson Carver, a.k.a. the Hebrew Hammer, a.k.a. "the certified circumcised dick," to save the Festival of Lights.

Wearing a Star of David-emblazoned eye-patch, Peter Coyote (Erin Brockovich) is Chief Bloomenberganteinthal, who heads the Jewish Justice League – the six-pointed security compound of the Jewish people. He enlists Hammer's help, but only after the league determines Henry Kissinger is "too old" for the job.

Coyote does a perfect parody of the one-eyed Moshe Dayan, hamming it up with dripping mouthfuls of bagels-and-lox noshings, while barking orders with zaide's eastern European accent.

Hammer also asks his black friend Mohammed (Mario Van Peebles), from the Kwanzaa Liberation Front, for his assistance. The Black Panther-like activist, with a penchant for fine ladies and ebonics, knows that a threat to one alternative to Christmas could mean the end for others too. Peebles (Ali) and Goldberg play extremely well off one another, especially when their bantering pokes fun at some offensive slang terminology.

The relationship between Hammer and Esther steams up (who would have guessed?), but not too much to keep this from being a family film. In a hilarious scene, Hammer's mother (Nora Dunn) arranges a shidduch between the two at the Shabbat table.

The Hebrew Hammer blends one-part Shaft, one-part Batman, and one-part Naked Gun in a playful mix that will have both Jews and gentiles chuckling. There's also plenty of '70s guitar wa-wa and staccato drum hi-hats to go around in this laugh-out-loud blaxsploitation homage.

Writer and director Jonathan Kesselman has produced a remarkable farce, with a spectrum of unpredictably clever gags. The Hebrew Hammer is a smart, and irreverent satire that gives Jewish humour a fresh face.

It's being screened May 8 at 9:30 p.m. with Kesselman in attendance.

Disparate Jewish entertainers profiled

By LARRY ANKLEWICZ
Special to The CJN

Documentary films about Jewish personalities are not something new. Two such films have recently been released on video and DVD and provide two completely different viewpoints on the world of entertainment.

The Kid Stays in the Picture is the fascinating story of Robert Evans. Evans was a businessman visiting Hollywood in order to sell women's slacks when he was discovered by Norma Shearer at the pool at the Beverly Hills Hotel.

Suddenly, Evans was the hottest new star in Hollywood, after having knocked on doors for years without success and being forced to seek work in another line.

Shortly after this, Evans was signed to play the matador opposite Ava Gardner in The Sun Also Rises. Evans was overjoyed, but he also learned something very important while working on this latter film. Many of the actors and creative people wanted him replaced, but Daryl Zanuk refused and told everyone complaining that "the kid stays in the picture and anyone who doesn't like it can quit."

Evans was impressed and decided he wanted to be a producer who has that kind of power. He wanted to be the boss.

That's exactly what happened. Evans took an option on a novel and used it to get into a position where he made the decisions. A short time later, Evans was hired as production chief at Paramount and became very successful with such hits as Rosemary's Baby, Love Story and The Godfather.

But Hollywood has a history of chewing up people and spitting them out when its done with them. And just as Robert Evans was the toast of the town for a while, he also ran into a losing streak and was eventually removed from his position of power.

All this is chronicled in this terrific film, and it is all narrated by a much older and wiser Robert Evans.

The other interesting documentary is called Porn Star, which tells the story of one of the most popular stars in the history of adult films, Ron Jeremy.

His is not the stereotypical story about a porn star. Jeremy is short, overweight, hairy and middle aged. Yet despite this, Jeremy is adored by millions of fans.

Jeremy has spent more than 25 years in the adult film industry with more than 1,600 films to his credit and sits at the pinnacle of his chosen profession.

Despite all this, Jeremy is obsessed with making it in mainstream films. He has tried many time to cross over and leave the porn industry, with little success. But he is still hoping, and this film provides a peek into an area of the entertainment business most of us know little about.

What these two films accomplish is show us how people who have taken different paths have both succeeded in such different ways. Both films are available on VHS cassette and DVD. The Kid Stays in the Picture has been released in Canada by Alliance Atlantis and Porn Star is distributed by Mongrel Media.

Tampa prospect's junior season comes to early end

By ELI SHUPAK
Special to The CJN

Adam Henrich moved back into his Thornhill home just days before Passover, satisfied with his third year of major junior hockey, but disappointed it didn't last just a little bit longer.

The 19-year-old Brampton Battalion power forward had just finished his second consecutive season as the club's leading scorer and led the team to its first-ever Ontario Hockey League (OHL) Central Division title.

After defeating the Barrie Colts in six games in the first playoff round, Brampton blanked St. Michael's 7-0 to start off round two before dropping the next four games to see their post-season drive come to a crashing halt.

"The team had a pretty successful season," said Henrich, in the process of packing his belongings prior to leaving his Brampton billet's home.

"If you looked at the papers in the beginning of the year, they had us finishing anywhere from seventh to ninth in the conference."

Henrich, the Tampa Bay Lightning's first draft pick in the second round (60th overall) of last June's NHL entry draft, got off to the fastest start in Battalion history when he scored seven goals in the season's first six games.

However, Henrich was assessed a gross misconduct penalty in the next contest after inadvertently flipping the puck into the stands following a two-on-one break that was whistled offside. Brampton went 1-4 while he served a five-game suspension.

He struggled upon his return to the lineup, with just one goal in the next 15 games, but picked things up in the second half, finishing the season with 31 goals and 33 assists in 63 games. The six-foot-four, 230-pounder tallied four goals and one assist in 11 playoff games.

Henrich showed a marked improvement in his overall play this season, winding up plus 24, a year after he was a minus three.

He expects to be back in Brampton in the fall, but will be working out hard over the summer with the hope the Lightning will offer him a training camp invitation.

Henrich's 23-year-old brother Michael, the Edmonton Oilers first-round selection in 1998 (13th overall), saw health issues hold back his development this year.

After getting mononucleosis at training camp in the fall, he was sidelined a few months. To get back into game shape, he signed a deal to play with Mora IK of the Swedish League.

The six-foot-two, 206-lb winger also served some international duty this season as part of the Canadian National team that won the 2002 Deutschland Cup in Germany back in November. Michael also represented his country at the Sweden Games in Stockholm in February.

He is now back in North America and was loaned out by Edmonton's AHL affiliate in Hamilton to the Hershey Bears for the remainder of the Bears' season. Hershey, Colorado's American Hockey League club, was subsequently defeated in an opening round playoff series with the AHL's defending champion Chicago Wolves, Atlanta's farm team.

"It's unfortunate for him this year that things didn't go his way," said younger brother Adam. "He'll hope to go to camp next year and crack Edmonton's lineup. If not, it would be great for him if he could play at home in Toronto."

The Henriches' younger sister Laura is also quite an athlete. The 16-year-old student at Community Hebrew Academy of Richmond Hill excels as a member of the Cougars basketball team and also plays hoops in a league at the Bathurst Jewish Centre.

Cutting wood for a widow in Toronto

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

There is a chassidic tale told of a pious rabbi who arrived late at the synagogue for Yom Kippur services because he had been cutting wood for an old widow living in a cabin in the forest.

I have heard this story 10,000 times, but I always feel inspired and hopeful upon hearing its message about the decency of human beings. The rabbi in this parable conjures images of a pristine and fastidious person with a strapping physique but soft hands; a rebellious spirit prepared to challenge the omnipotent when a human being is suffering.

Over the years, I have been honoured to meet people in the Toronto Jewish community who personify the graciousness and caring of the rabbi in our story.

One specific person who stands out does not live in the forest near Lodz or Slupia, Poland, but off Bayview Avenue near Post Road. He is not a Talmudic scholar draped in a kittel, but a well-coiffed, Armani-dressed developer.

The person I'm writing about has requested anonymity. I will, therefore, call him Dave.

Dave and his family spend their summers at a cottage on Lake Simcoe. Dave's family became friends with a "lovely family" who live across the lake – the Macdonalds. Over the years, their friendship blossomed, even as the Macdonalds were visited by financial tragedy and a general lack of mazel (luck).

Dave's family decided they would accept one of the Macdonalds' sons into their home on their posh Bayview Avenue side street. They bought the young adult new clothes and sent him to a career placement and testing centre. Dave's children took their new family member to all of Toronto's great sports cathedrals. The Macdonalds were in awe of Dave and his family's giving and their willingness to chop wood for their son. Dave told me he couldn't think of a greater lesson in tikkun olam (repairing the world) for his children than the one they learned from sharing their home with the young Macdonald.

I have met many more people like Dave, rich and poor, who have sacrificed the quality of their familial solitude to assist someone less fortunate.

I have a friend who moved into a smaller apartment (600 square feet) so he could save $150 a month, which he gives to a lifelong friend struggling to make ends meet.

Can you imagine the enormity of this deed?

Examples of individuals who perform such beautiful acts – what the Ba'al Shem Tov (the founder of the chassidic movement) referred to as "getting your hands dirty to help your friend" – are plentiful in the non-Jewish community as well.

Recently my organization, Ve'ahavta, began working with members of a very virtuous gentile family who regularly travel the streets of Toronto, on their own initiative, feeding the homeless and assisting them to build their lives. This family owns and operates a major company with shares listed on the Toronto Stock Exchange.

I grew up in a home where our family space was shared with countless others in need. Over the years, I have met other people who have initiated large acts of kindness through the sharing of their "self" in a most commanding and memorable way.

Their diligently holistic approach to giving did not create a new need within either the giver – say, for honour – or the recipient – to grovel with appreciation – but rather reached the apex of an ideal sacrifice where no one slides, and where all can walk.

The next time the seat next to you is empty in shul, consider that the person who normally sits in it may just be wandering in the woods behind the Lipa Green Building, cutting cords of wood for a cold soul.

Go out and find him, and help him.

About Life

Dear Ella,

My wife of 12 years and I have come to an agreement to separate. We are no longer seeing eye to eye on anything, and we argue more often than speak civilly to each other.

Although Sandra, my wife is as unhappy as I am, she is not taking this breakup well. She is constantly badmouthing me to our friends, relatives and, worst of all, to our two girls, aged nine and 13. My belief is that they should be kept out of this mess and that we should never speak badly about each other in front of them.

Sandra says the same thing, but she does not practise what she preaches. I am already noticing a difference in the children. They seem to be quieter and more withdrawn. What can I do to stop this before there is any more damage?

Poor Parenting

Dear Poor Parenting

You are absolutely right when you say you should keep the kids out of this mess. This is something you and your wife have created and the effect on your children will be an unfortunate result of the entire situation.

You can control how you behave and what you say to the kids, but you cannot control what is said when they are with Sandra.

Sandra must be told by an unbiased party about the damage she can inflict with her negative behaviour. The children must be protected from trauma and never be used as weapons.

You and Sandra should have a main goal of finding ways to co-operate as parents, regardless of your personal feelings toward one another.

You may find this very difficult to do on your own, and it would be appropriate at this time to enlist the help of a professional. You could try family counselling, or you may be able to get some insight about the children's behaviour and/or some direction from their pediatrician.

Any way you look at it, this is the path you and your wife have chosen and you must be on board together when it comes to raising your daughters. Their futures depend on it.

Readers may submit their questions to Ella at The CJN., email: eb@cjnews.com. But Ella is not a professional counsellor. She brings to the questions posed by readers her unique brand of earthy wisdom. Her advice is not a replacement for medical, legal or any other advice. For serious problems, consult a professional.

CMDA resolves tax dispute

Organization retains its charitable status

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

The two-year battle waged by Canadian Magen David Adom for Israel (CMDA) with the tax department to keep its charitable status is over, after the organization went through the formality of being de-registered and then re-registered the next day.

CMDA president Joseph Bitton said this was part of a bargain struck with the Canada Customs and Revenue Agency (CCRA). For its part, CMDA withdrew its application to the Supreme Court to appeal a court ruling from last year that would have revoked its charitable status, and it has changed how it operates in order to conform to the Income Tax Act.

CMDA is now abiding by the CCRA's demand, which was upheld last year by the Federal Court of Appeal, that it maintain greater control over the ambulances and medical equipment it sends to Israel, Bitton said. CMDA has appointed two people as its agents in Israel to act as intermediaries with Magen David Adom (MDA), the country's emergency and blood service, the beneficiaries of its donations.

"They will check where the ambulances are at all times and report regularly to us," Bitton said. CMDA will retain ownership of the vehicles, as the CCRA requires, and have control over how they are disposed of when no longer needed by MDA.

CCRA spokesperson Collette Gentes-Hawn confirmed that, after the CMDA dropped its appeal to the top court on April 29, CMDA's registration was revoked on May 3. CMDA was then re-registered as a charitable organization on May 4. Both actions, she said, appeared in the Canada Gazette, the official medium for the publication of all legally binding decisions made by the government of Canada.

Gentes-Hawn would only say that CMDA had now been "reconstituted" and "changed the way it does business" to conform with the law.

Bitton said CCRA officials had offered CMDA the choice of not having the revocation notice published. But CMDA wanted to have the de-registration and the re-registration on the record in order to give both legal effect.

Israelis last week remembered their fallen heroes on Yom Hazikaron. The next day, they celebrated the country's 55 years of independence with fireworks, singing and dancing. The News in Brief

CANADA

Interfaith Dialogue

VANCOUVER — About 300 people attended a recent panel discussion on Muslim-Jewish relations in what was billed as a significant community outreach effort. Sponsored by Canadian Jewish Congress and held at Temple Sholom, the panel included Jewish and Muslim scholars from U.S. and Israeli colleges and think tanks.

Raging Grannies Resign

OTTAWA — Two Jewish members of the Raging Grannies, a group of women over 55 who demonstrate for peace and social justice, withdrew from the group recently over anti-Israel and anti-Zionism in the protest movement. The last straw for the women was at an anti-Iraq war protest when a speaker accused Israel of human rights abuses. Other Raging Grannies criticized the Jewish members for leaving the protest.

ISRAEL

Israelis Fire up Grills

JERUSALEM — Israelis were expected to eat some 800 tons of meat, hamburgers, kebabs, hot dogs and chicken products over the Independence Day holiday. Barbecuing is one of the traditional ways Israelis celebrate Yom Ha'atzmaut and the upcoming holiday of Lag b'Omer.

Population Growing

JERUSALEM — Israel's population grew by 2.2 per cent during the past year, according to statistics released on the eve of Israel's 55th Independence Day. The country's population stands at 6.7 million people. The 5.4 million Jews in Israel constitute 81 per cent of the population. Israeli Arabs number 1.4 million. The Jewish population in Israel represents 38 per cent of the world Jewish population.

Telephone Fun

JERUSALEM — Comverse, an Israeli firm that provides systems services for wireless, wireline and Internet telephony, announced the availability of an entertainment application called Fun Dial. It allows callers to hear customized music, sound effects, or personal or promotional messages, instead of standard ringback, busy, and call waiting tones. Subscribers will also be able to personalize and select the content they will hear when they make an outgoing call.

Vin Gold

JERUSALEM — Two Israeli wineries took gold medals at the recent Challenge International du Vin at Bordeaux in France. Ramat Hagolan won for its 1999 Cabernet Sauvignon and Barkan for its Merlot 2001 Reserve. Some 5,000 wines from 31 countries were entered in the contest.

WORLD

Forest Awareness

WASHINGTON — The U.S. forest service and the Jewish National Fund are working jointly to help improve forest awareness in U.S. cities. The joint program will include information on fires and fuels, overstocked forests, invasive species and insect diseases, and managed recreation. The JNF will roll out conservation education programs in Jewish schools in Atlanta, New York, Southern California and Chicago, and will promote the issue in public festivals.

Download Posters

BOSTON — The David Project, a peace education organization based in Boston, has launched a new web site, www.IsraelCelebration.com, featuring free posters that celebrate Israel's multicultural, democratic and scientific contributions to the world, as well as its vibrant culture. The David Project invites campus and community members to browse the dozens of posters, print them and display them.

Hillel Interim President

WASHINGTON — The Hillel board of directors has named Avraham Infeld as its interim president. Infeld, who currently serves in Jerusalem as counsel for Israel affairs, will move to Washington, D.C., and hold the position for one year while Hillel continues the presidential search process. Infeld will assume his new position in June.

Teachers' Boycott

LONDON — Britain's professors union debated launching an academic boycott of Israel at a conference earlier this month. The tabled motion charged Israel with "repeated breaches of UN resolutions and the Geneva Conventions" and calls for universities and union members to "review, with a view to severing, any academic links they may have with official Israeli institutions, including universities."

NPR Slammed

BOSTON — A nationwide protest against National Public Radio's Israel coverage was to have taken place May 14. A Boston group called Friends of Israel is promoting "NPR: Tell the Truth" day, when demonstrations against NPR's "biased coverage of the Middle East" are slated for 33 cities in the United States. The group is also asking businesses and foundations that support local NPR affiliates to cease doing so until the network's tone improves.

Cousins Meet After 64 Years

CHICAGO — "After 64 years, I never imagined I would see her again. I was positive she had died," says a shocked and excited Ruth Alon, who last week was to be reunited for the first time since 1939 with her long-lost cousin, Angela Poeller.

Born in Vienna, the two cousins were separated early in the war and have not seen each other since. Leaving behind her entire family, Alon arrived in Israel in 1939 with Aliyat Ha'Noar (Immigrant Youth Movement) and settled in Kibbutz Beit Ha'Shita.

For many years, Alon searched in vain for any sign of life from the family she left behind. Two years ago, in a last attempt to locate any family survivors, Alon began to search the Internet and stumbled upon four families with the last name Poeller living in Chicago. She immediately wrote four letters detailing her story, but did not hear back until two months ago when she received a moving letter from Chicago. With the help of the United Jewish Communities (UJC), Angela Poeller, who arrived in Israel on a UJC Mission, was to be reunited with Ruth Alon at the Inbal Hotel in Jerusalem.

By JENNIFER M. PAQUETTE
Special to The CJN

"It's Israel's birthday!" cheered Kaille Goldman, 4, from atop her father's shoulders.

A light drizzle couldn't keep her away from Toronto's annual Yom Ha'atzmaut walk on May 7, along Bathurst Street from the Bathurst JCC to Earl Bales Park.

Nor could it wash away Elisha Krauss's grin. "Israel is the best!" exclaimed the six-year-old Netivot HaTorah student whose family went on a mission to Israel several months ago.

"I liked everything – the Kotel… I love to go to McDonalds. The food is the best!" she declared.

Because of the evening's damp, chilly weather, attendance was down this year. Whereas about 15,000 attended last year's event, the 55th anniversary of Israel's independence was celebrated by fewer than 6,000. Once the walk was under way, though, enthusiasm returned and umbrellas closed one by one as the rain eased off for a few hours of songs and flag-waving, Israeli music and kosher barbecued treats.

At Earl Bales, the Moshav Band entertained the crowd with its noisy brand of country hoedown-style Israeli music. In the midst of the happy din, students in their teens and 20s draped in Israeli flags and sporting Tzahal (Israeli army) gear, ground the grass in front of the stage into a grimy mosh pit.

"The 20-somethings came out in force," said Israel Now's Danny Fine, organizer of the event. "Folks with younger kids in carriages saw the rain at 6 o'clock and had to make the decision whether or not to go."

Brenda Cappe, 21, a European History major at the University of Toronto, visited Israel in 1998 on a Young Judaea trip. Wearing her Tzahal shirt proudly, she said she hopes to go back as soon as she can afford to. Why support Israel? "If we don't, no one else will," she said.

Progressive Conservative candidate for Eglinton-Lawrence, Corinne Korzen, was also on hand to show she's backing Israel 100 per cent. Korzen, an observant Jew, said she's looking forward to travelling there more frequently when her daughter's family – her son-in-law has most recently served as rabbi of Vancouver's Orthodox synagogue – returns to live in Efrat in the near future.

When she can't get to Israel in person, Korzen does what she can to shop "kachol v'lavan" (blue and white). "We're trying to buy only Israeli wines from the Golan," Korzen said. "And, of course," she added, pointing to a sticker on her jacket, "my party colours are blue and white."

Blue and white is also a passion for Joseph Fox, chair of Israel Now's Buy Israeli campaign. He was promoting the wide range of Israeli products available in Toronto.

A suicide bomber changed my life forever …

Like other victims of terrorism, Sheri Ben-Aroya's life has been changed permanently as the fight for freedom continues and as Israel's very existence is being threatened.

"I had managed to get leave from my Golan Heights air-force intelligence unit to spend the Pesach holiday last year at home. Our guest list had grown so large that we decided to have our seder at the Park Hotel near our home in Netanya.

During the seder, a suicide bomber exploded himself near our table. As a result, my 46-year-old father was killed instantly, and each member of our family suffered severe physical wounds and mental trauma.

The doctors gave me a 50% chance of survival. I had suffered critical head injuries, lost the sight in my right eye, my right arm and leg were paralyzed and I developed chronic problems with my nasal tissue and fluids.

I was beyond recognition — my long hair had been shaved off and my 8-year-old brother Elad refused to hug me saying, "this is not Sheri". I cried many hours and tried to console myself that he was just a kid. I didn't learn of my father's death until weeks later; everyone thought that the shock would make my condition deteriorate.

At the time of the terrorist attack, I was in military service and and was now considered a disabled veteran. I could join the Beit Halochem Centre in Tel Aviv and undergo rehabilitation there. I go there twice a week for occupational therapy, physiotherapy, art and ceramics. From being in a wheelchair, not able to talk or move half my body, I have re-learned to speak, move the right side of my body and walk again, and I've become left-handed and have memorized the English alphabet.

I no longer have my same group of friends or boyfriend. It's comforting for me to know that Beit Halochem is there for me, not only for my physical rehabilitation, but also for my mental and social well-being. Beit Halochem is my lifeline …"

PLEASE ASSIST the more than 50,000 disabled war veterans and victims of terrorism who turn to Beit Halochem to help them in their recovery.

Shabbat shalom

From the editor's desk

There is a typically powerful and poignant expression in Yiddish that speaks to the vicissitudes of human existence: mahn tracht, Gott lacht. In literal translation it means: man thinks, God laughs. In poetic translation it means: man proposes but God disposes.

What the saying refers to, of course, is the fact that although we may make plans, indeed, are obliged to make plans, it is not always in our power to fulfil them.

It was my plan to be in Israel on Yom Ha'atzmaut and to describe for CJN readers the colours and the spectacle of the Independence Day ceremony on Har Herzl in Jerusalem.

That was my plan. But "God laughed."

I did eventually arrive in Israel last week, which is where this column is being written, but only after Yom Ha'atzmaut.

Nevertheless, even though I missed the celebrations in Jerusalem, it is still a great thing to be in Israel. The excitement at landing in Ben-Gurion airport, despite the feeling of crumpled grunge that accompanies an 11-hour nocturnal flight, was palpable. And the emotional pull one feels after stepping into the sway of Israel's unique magnetic field is indescribable.

Suitcase collected, shekels purchased, hugs and kisses exchanged with awaiting family, cell phone rented, I was on my way to the home that would be my repose for the Shabbat gently approaching beyond the next sunset.

Shabbat is a vital weekly respite in Israel. The Jewish state is experiencing a great deal of turmoil. (Turmoil, it seems, was Israel's midwife at its birth 55 years ago and has remained with it ever since, like a guest who refuses to leave.)

A new peace process (the road map process) has already begun, with all its attendant uncertainties and partisan, political combativeness. Proposed severe budgetary cuts have alienated the public sector and threaten to emaciate public services. The economy is depressed due to the reduction in tourism and foreign investment wrought by 2½ years of Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat's war. And social, health, education and welfare problems are exacerbated as a result, due to the drastic fall-off in the economy.

Despite the turmoil, however, and despite the chamsin (the hot, desert wind that blows up from the Arabian peninsula approximately 50 days a year bringing with it temperatures near 40 C), being in this home even after Yom Ha'atzmaut was a celebration in and of itself.

There is a great deal about this home that embodies the surge and flow of Jewish history during the last century and captures the signal importance of having a Jewish state, even one in turmoil – and a state for the Jews, however imperfect – on earth.

My journey to this home actually began in Poland before World War II. My mother was born there and lived with her parents and siblings in Zamosc, not far from the home of her uncle (her father's brother) and his children, her cousins.

The war was a horribly cruel passageway. Only one out of each 10 Jews from Poland made it through.

In addition to my mother's immediate family, one of those Jews who made it through the war was my mother's cousin's son. After the war, he found his way to the newly created State of Israel.

There, he fell in love with a dark-haired, brown-eyed Jewish girl from Haifa. She and her parents were born in Beirut.

Her father walked by himself over mountains and through forests, in the mid-1930s, to reach what was then Eretz Yisrael, not yet Medinat Yisrael. After he found a job, he sent for this wife and children and they eventually settled in Haifa, where their family was enlarged by the advent of more children.

One of those children was a boy whom I would eventually meet and befriend when he was married (to someone whose parents were born in Yemen) with four children of his own, in the early 1970's, while visiting his brother-in-law and wife (my mother's cousin's son and his wife).

It was in his home that I greeted the Shabbat last week.

His eldest daughter is married to a man whose parents, both survivors of the Shoah, were from Romania. Another daughter is married to a man whose parents, also survivors of the Shoah, were born in France and in Romania. The youngest daughter is married to a man whose parents were born in Tunisia. His son is not yet married. But he bears the name of his father's best friend, a paratrooper, who was killed in the Six Day War recapturing Jerusalem.

The line of Jewish peoplehood and of Jewish history that took me to my Shabbat experience last weekend travelled from Canada to Israel through Poland, Lebanon, Yemen, Romania, France and Tunisia. And it is only in Israel that such a line could exist. For no other place or government on earth was willing to let that line pass through its borders.

The name of the family in whose home I spent Shabbat last week is Shalom. How fitting that is.

Zundel expresses admiration for Hitler

Ernst Zundel, who once wrote a book titled The Hitler We Love and Why, last week told a Federal Court he owes his life to the German dictator.

"I am entitled to admire a man who brought Germany work, bread, peace, honour and a place in the sun," Zundel stated. He said his mother once told him he would not have been born had it not been for Adolf Hitler, whose economic policies gave his father work and enabled his parents to have children.

Zundel was testifying at a court review of a government finding that he poses a security threat to Canada. Confirmation of that finding could open the door to Zundel's deportation to his native Germany, where he faces incarceration for promoting hatred of Jews.

Court documents filed in support of the security allegation state Zundel's "status within the white supremacist movement is such that adherents are inspired to actuate his ideology. By his comportment as a leader and ideologue, the ministers [of justice and citizenship] believe Zundel intends serious violence to be a consequence of his influence. To this extent, the ministers believe and assert that Zundel is engaged in the propagation of serious political violence to a degree commensurate with those who actually execute the acts."

Addressing Federal Court Judge Pierre Blais, government lawyer Toby Hoffman described Zundel as the patriarch of the white supremacist movement. He said the movement employs violence to further its goals.

Court documents outlined Zundel's record of distributing neo-Nazi propaganda through a variety of media, most recently the Internet, making him a critical player in the movement in Canada and internationally.

Zundel has ties to Nick Griffin and the British National Party, which has been linked to a bombing spree in April 1999; to William Pierce, author of the The Turner Diaries, the book that inspired Oklahoma City bomber Timothy McVeigh; as well as to extremists Wolfgang Droege (Heritage Front), Marc Lemire, Terry Long (Aryan Nations), Tony McAleer, George Burdi (Church of the Creator), Tom Metzger, Richard Butler (Aryan Nations) and others.

Zundel, meanwhile, testified that "there is no white supremacist movement," saying the extremist right is too fractured to agree on anything. He argued he has never advocated violence, calling himself "the Gandhi of the right."

Zundel has been in detention since he was thrown out of the United States by U.S. immigration authorities after he overstayed a visitor's visa. Zundel lived in Canada from 1958 to 2000 but left for the United States in the middle of a Human Rights Tribunal that eventually ruled his Web site (www.zundelsite.org) distributed material that brought contempt on Jews.

At the time, Zundel said he was leaving Canada for good. On his return this year, he immediately filed a refugee claim, arguing he would face political persecution in Germany if he was deported there.

Zundel will remain in custody until his case is resolved. The next hearing is scheduled for Friday.

Meanwhile, Zundel's lawyer, Doug Christie, has said he plans to mount a constitutional challenge to the proceedings.

Walkers will stand up for Israel at annual walk

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's upcoming Walk with Israel on May 25 has a few new features this year, but its goal of expressing solidarity with Israel and raising money to help Israel is a longstanding tradition.

For the first time, organizers are encouraging adult walkers as well as children to get sponsors and help raise funds, said Dodi Weill, who is co-chairing the walk with David Peltz.

Also, the operation has gone more high-tech, with registration and on-line sponsorships being facilitated electronically if participants like.

This year's 7-km route begins and ends at Coronation Park, across from the Canadian National Exhibition's Prince's Gates at Lakeshore Boulevard and Strachan Avenue. The walk will proceed along Strachan to Dundas Street, with checkpoints at Trinity-Bellwoods Park and Bellevue Square before heading south again.

The post-walk festival, sponsored by RioCan, will take place at the National Trade Centre at Exhibition Place from 11:30 a.m. to 4 p.m. and will feature play areas, a kosher barbecue with vegetarian options, and entertainment including magicians, jugglers, clowns, Mandell Entertainment and the bands Bais Groove and Kenahora.

"Our goal is to have a real festive celebration of Israel," said Weill, a teacher and former chair of UJA Federation Women's Campaign and Advocacy. "There will be activities for all different ages."

The walk, the largest of its kind, has typically attracted 15,000 walkers in recent years, said Weill. Between 800 and 900 volunteers, working before and during the event, make it all possible. Volunteers are still needed, particularly for marshalling at street crossings, said Weill.

Money raised will be used to help Israel's social services, which have been affected by government cutbacks, and also to assist victims of terror attacks and to fight anti-Semitism locally and worldwide, said Weill.

Peltz, a longtime community volunteer who sells investment real estate, said that for him the walk is a commitment to two things: "standing up and being counted as a strong supporter of Israel, but [also] we have to stand up as proud Jews against anti-Semitism, which is growing at a fairly alarming rate throughout the world."

Organizers hope to exceed last year's fundraising of $300,000, said Peltz.

For more information, to volunteer or to register for the walk, go to www.jewishtoronto.net, or call the Walk with Israel Hotline at 416-631-5700.

Mayor Lastman bows out of municipal trip to Israel

Toronto Mayor Mel Lastman has cancelled his trip to Israel to deal with the SARS crisis and its aftermath.

Lastman and his wife Marilyn were to have led a dozen other Ontario mayors and municipal officials on a mission to Israel, sponsored by Canadian Jewish Congress, May 10-16.

"He has to take care of business at home instead of abroad," explained Lastman's spokesperson, Scot Magnish.

"There was lots of discussion. He wanted to go," said Magnish, but Lastman is too busy dealing with the impact of the SARS outbreak to have gone on the mission.

A similar mission to Milan has also been put on hold.

Magnish said the mayor is "holding out hope" of still travelling to Israel in the near future.

The mission, scheduled to return this week, met with a host of municipal officials in Israel and was slated to hold talks with Prime Minister Ariel Sharon and Finance Minister Benjamin Netanyahu.

Rabbis voice opposing views on same-sex marriage

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

Judaism regards marriage as the union of a man and a woman, and is driven by the biblical commandment to "be fruitful and multiply," a leading academic has told the House of Commons committee studying same-sex marriage.

"My views are informed by the normative authority of the Jewish tradition and are, I believe, held by the majority of Jews in Canada who are religiously affiliated," Prof. David Novak told the Commons' justice and human rights committee, which recently wrapped up cross-country hearings on whether and how same-sex marriages can be legally recognized.

Novak's appearance came about the same time as the Canadian Coalition of Liberal Rabbis for Same-Sex Marriage argued in support of homosexual marriage before the Ontario Court of Appeal [CJN, May 8].

Novak, an ordained rabbi and professor of Jewish studies at the University of Toronto, said that in a strictly religious sense, Judaism is only interested in a marriage between two bona fide Jews. "This is what the Jewish tradition calls kiddushin, or sacred marriage."

But the Jewish tradition also recognizes marriage as an institution that began with Adam and Eve, and thus as a human institution. Judaism, said Novak, doesn't negate what might be called universal marriage, it simply adds some further requirements for its adherents.

"Among the essentials of universal marriage that remains intact for Jews is the restriction of marriage to a union between a woman and a man. On this point, Judaism reaffirms a norm it views as being in place since the creation of humans on earth."

In this universal definition of marriage, he went on, the commandment in Genesis to "be fruitful and multiply" applies to all humans, and does not require the affirmation of any particular religion.

And the commandment is not just to conceive children – through the natural way – but for a heterosexual couple to form a lasting union "designed to build a family in which the raising of children is its main, although not exclusive, purpose.

"The birth and rearing of children by both their natural parents is in the best interest of society. That is why heterosexual marriage deserves the approval and encouragement of society," said Novak, whose views have also been included in testimony before courts considering same-sex marriage.

Judaism also considers the insemination of a lesbian "immoral" because "it excuses a father from taking any responsibility for the children resulting from his sexual relationship with the child's mother, even if that relationship was only based on masturbation. It excuses the father from the responsibility of even having to identify himself to his child."

Allowing two women to marry and engage a third party to impregnate one of them "willfully destroys the natural right of children to the responsibility of both their parents, and it destroys the natural duty of both parents to any children they have enabled to be born."

Novak said the same holds true for two men who engage a woman to bear a child one of them would father.

"Jewish tradition affirms that the best possible conditions for the birth and rearing of children are found in a family rooted in a permanent marital union between male and female parents," Novak said in his submission.

Members of religious traditions like Judaism "have a right" to insist that the state not radically re-define an institution like marriage, he added.

Finally, Novak posited that same-sex marriage could open the door to religious discrimination because faith groups opposed to it would "very likely be looked upon as enemies of the state. If that happens, the religious liberty exercised by many Canadians in questions of marriage and family will be regarded as a form of socially unacceptable prejudice. That will be detrimental to the type of multicultural society we now have in Canada, a society of which we are proud and want to extend into the indefinite future."

Novak told The CJN his presentation has been approved by the Beit Din of Toronto.

* * *

In a written submission, Rabbi Steve Greenberg said Orthodox rabbis "are beginning to understand that their gay and lesbian congregants are not freely choosing to be gay, but are simply discovering themselves to be essentially different."

While Orthodoxy rejects homosexual relations, experts in Halachah are beginning to include in their deliberations the testimony of gays who wish to remain faithful to the tradition, said Rabbi Greenberg, an instructor at the New York-based CLAL – the National Jewish Center for Learning and Leadership, and who appeared in Trembling Before G-d, the landmark 2001 film about homosexual Orthodox and chassidic Jews.

Orthodoxy places many restrictions on marriage, he pointed out, such as between a kohen and a divorcée or convert; and between the child of an adulterous union and any Jew. However, civil marriage is open to all those, and no one hears protest from the Orthodox community over the violation of its sensibilities. "Orthodox communities have grown accustomed to the challenges of living in secular societies."

Same-sex marriage, like marriage generally, is a conservative institution expressing lifelong commitment, caring, love and support, he said.

"Central to Orthodox Jewish teaching is the importance of family. The rejection of gay coupling is hardly an expression of family values. Indeed, it is just the opposite. It is surely in the interest of families to support such unions that glue us all together by the force of our loving commitments to each other."

As well, adoption and surrogacy offer gay couples the same potential to reproduce as they do for heterosexual couples, he argued.

Toronto man loses 30 lbs., keeps it off – then loses more!

Hi, my name is Joey Thernesz. On a whim, I stopped in at a Positive Changes Hypnosis Centre to inquire about weight loss. I approached hypnotism as a last resort.

Up to then, I had been on numerous diets and exercise programs, where I succeeded up to a point but failed again and again.

I was overweight at 177 lbs., my clothes were tight and my jeans size had increased repeatedly. I hated looking at myself in the mirror and hated looking at any photographs of myself.

I was indulging in everything I fancied: chocolate bars, donuts, hamburgers, milkshakes, cakes, tons of ice cream, and more. I spent an awful lot of money on food — mostly junk food.

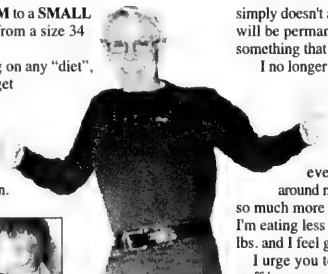
After the first hypnotic session, it seems my whole life changed. I virtually floated out of the clinic.

I began purchasing vegetables and fruit. I now sleep up to 8 hours every night whereas before, I would sleep four or five hours and perhaps snooze in the afternoon, between eating binges. Now I awake refreshed and alive.

The most important benefit was the immediate weight loss. I was quite unprepared for this. A miracle! Gradually, the belt was tightened to the next level, and the next, until I reached the end. I went from a MEDIUM to a SMALL size, my pants from a size 34 to 30.

By not being on any "diet", I don't have to get off any "diet". There is no calorie counting, pills, negative side effects or starvation.

BEFORE



AFTER

I've learned to make better choices because I want to, not because I have to. There is nothing to stop me from overeating or from eating junk food — if I were so inclined. It simply doesn't appeal to me. I feel that this change will be permanent; for the rest of my life, this is something that even I can manage.

I no longer dwell on food or the next meal because other things happening in my life are more important. Food is no longer an obsession. What I do feel is a sense of joy, a more positive outlook and an interest in everything going on with me and around me. I have more pep, energy and feel so much more alive. Cravings have disappeared. I'm eating less and enjoying it more. I weigh 147 lbs. and I feel great!

I urge you to call Positive Changes now. The staff is very professional and helpful and the clinic is beautiful, warm, and comfortable. If I have one regret, it's that I wish I had done this years ago.

UPDATE — TWO YEARS LATER:

After almost two years, I'm down to a trim 136 lbs. Meanwhile, having received my certification as a hypnotist, I'm now helping clients at a local Positive Changes Hypnosis Centre.

The challenge we dare not ignore

Last week in the Jerusalem Post there were two reports about American Jewry that were very troubling and that carried major implications for Jews worldwide.

On the occasion of Yom Ha'atzmaut, the paper interviewed Hebrew University professor Sergio Della-Pergola, one of the world's leading experts on the demographics of the Jewish people, on matters relating to the future of Israel and the Diaspora. He spoke openly about the dwindling number of Jews in the United States.

"During the 1990s, the size of the American Jewish population did not grow. It should have because of continuing immigration of Jews to the U.S. In fact, it declined by about 200,000.

"We know that in the 1990s, more Jews came to America – from eastern Europe, Israel, South Africa, Latin America and Iran – than left. Yet the surveys show that young age groups have significantly diminished. This points to a low birth rate and a low rate of Jewish identification by the children of mixed marriages."

Three days later, the paper carried a short news item about a 50-page report funded with a grant from the Andrea and Charles Bronfman Philanthropies concerning those very same "young age groups" of whom DellaPergola spoke. In particular, the report dealt with the way in which those young age groups in the United States related to the causes and to the messages of mainstream, communal Jewish organizations.

The report was titled Israel in the age of Eminem. According to the Jerusalem Post, the author concluded that "organizations, traditional messages and marketing methods do not appeal to most Jewish youth [defined as between 18 and 29 years of age], 80 per cent of whom are not engaged at all on the issue."

Without commenting on the merits of the report, its methodology or its underlying premises, the sheer size of the 80 per cent figure is staggering. When tied to the observations conveyed by DellaPergola, it is absolutely alarming.

Jewish communal leaders in Canada, as throughout the Jewish world, must take notice of this worrisome data. We cannot take too much solace in the fact that Jewish self-identification among Canadian "young age groups" may currently be higher than among their American counterparts. (Indeed, the Jewish census by self-identification under the category of "religion" will be released this week by Statistics Canada.) We know that the demographic pattern in the United States sounds a loud warning for the Jews of Canada as well.

The solution is decidedly not in the packaging of a resonant Jewish message to our "young age groups." The true solution is in instilling that message in them, in trying to foster in them a deeply held, unshakable attachment to their Judaism. That means ensuring access for our children to appropriate avenues of intensive Jewish education. Such access, of course, requires, at a minimum, that formal Jewish education be affordable to the widest number of children possible. Achieving that affordability is the most urgent challenge facing our communal leaders. It is a challenge they dare not ignore.

'Ethnic cleansing' unacceptable

In recent years, ethnic cleansing has aroused strong opposition from many quarters. Yet one group of people continues to be singled out for ethnic cleansing – the Jewish people.

In her letter ("Communities should relocate," CJN, April 25) Andrea Kwavnick joins many who believe that elimination of the Jewish presence in Judea, Samaria, Gaza and eastern Jerusalem will assure the safety of those Jews remaining within the pre-1967 borders.

There is no longer any doubt that all Palestinian Arab factions want the Jews ethnically cleansed from "their land" of Palestine. For them, Jews in Tel Aviv have no more inherent right to live there than the hundreds of thousands of Jews living in the post-1967 territories.

In the Hitler era, there were Jews who thought that if they could help the Nazis clean out selected Jews, they would be saved.

If Jews hope to survive the Arab threat to their existence in Israel, all Jews must unite by asserting that no Jewish life is expendable and no Jewish home is dispensable.

Proud to be Jewish

As we lit yahrzeit candles in memory of our brothers and sisters who perished in the Shoah, we were reminded of how the Star of David, once a proud Jewish symbol, was used during the Holocaust as a badge of shame. The yellow star with the word "Jude" scrawled on it identified Jews as worthy of derision, hate and worse.

After the 1967 Six Day War when the Israel Defence Forces so spectacularly defeated the armies of five Arab countries whose goal was to destroy the Jewish homeland, soaring sales of Judaic ornaments attested to the pride and solidarity felt by Jews and non-Jews worldwide. The Star of David was once again seen as a badge of honour.

Fast forward to 2003 when 2½ years of intifadah have dealt a big blow to Israel. The scourge of anti-Semitism is once again rearing its ugly threatening head. Astronaut Ilan Ramon brought a ray of joy amid the anguish. We were all inspired by his powerful gesture, taking into space fundamental and poignant symbols of Jewish heritage. His special mission was to be an ambassador of the Jewish people.

We too have opportunities to be ambassadors of the Jewish people. By performing acts of love and kindness, by endeavouring to assume more responsibility for tikkun olam (repairing the world) and by proudly wearing symbols that identify us as Jews, we help to honour the cherished memories of our heroes and loved ones.

Beware relativism

Regarding Barbara Balfour's column, "More than two sides to every story" (CJN, April 25), it is obvious that much has changed since my years at university, particularly in the area of discomfort felt by many Jewish students as a result of aggressive intimidation by members of the "latest tile" in the Canadian mosaic.

I'm rather surprised that there is a course in Arab film studies at the University of Calgary. Are there also courses devoted to the study of Russian cinema, or German, Italian, Brazilian and Mexican? If not, could you enquire as to why that is so?

I thank Balfour for showing the Jewish "flag." Even if it is a little uncomfortable sometimes, we must never shrink from raising it even higher. We have much to be proud of.

As for the headline of her column, beware of moral relativism. Too many versions don't always illuminate the truth; on the contrary, they all too often tend to obscure and even conceal it.

One more word on role of universities

From the content and tone of her letter, "Getting an education" (CJN, May 1), I believe that Aliza Libman misinterpreted my letter and message of April 16 ("Students, smarten up").

The issue here is not the extra-curricular activities that I would encourage students to participate in while studying at a place of higher learning, but the discouraging of uncontrolled demonstrations that do nothing but cause animosity, hatred and in some instances physical injury.

Students learn from their professors and from their textbooks. They learn from each other by participating in organized discussions and debate while on campus. Students also learn from their parents and grandparents and take advantage of their years of experience. Nothing can be accomplished by political activism that encourages hostility towards fellow students, especially those of another ethnic background or religion.

I encourage Libman to study hard, observe well, listen intently, exchange ideas and she will find that one can "catch more flies with honey than with vinegar."

The miracle of modern Hebrew

To commemorate the 55th anniversary of the founding of the State of Israel, The CJN has commissioned a number of essays that explore various aspects of the state. The essays will appear periodically over the next few weeks. The following article celebrates the revival of the Hebrew language.

By CHANNA PINCHASI

We ought to recognize the greatness of the miracle that happened to the Hebrew language. Less than a century ago, it was hard to imagine that Hebrew could be the mother tongue of millions of Jews. That tens of thousands of Israeli kids would struggle – mainly with English – trying to learn other languages as their second language, that there would be Hebrew poetry, curses, movies and slang, and that all this would be completely normal and natural.

In order to metamorphosize from a holy tongue into a living language, in order to leave the synagogue and house of study and enter the wider world, the Hebrew language had to be reinvented.

How was this transition, from an ancient written to a modern spoken language, accomplished? Surely, from a cultural perspective, it was a complex process that required many people to willingly relinquish their mother tongue (and quite literally in many cases, the language of their mothers) and persevere in speaking a language that was missing many words.

Let's illustrate the problem using three examples of words that joined Hebrew within the last century. The first is matzlema (camera). Let's imagine for a moment a person – say, Eliezer Ben-Yehuda, the man credited with reviving Hebrew as a modern, spoken language – saw a camera and wondered what to call this object in Hebrew. As you may know, Hebrew is a language based on three letter roots and often new words for objects are derived from them.

The person probably recalled the verse in Genesis, "And God created man in his image, in the image of God He created him," and he made an association between the words tzelem, image, and matzlema.

Applying the Hebrew root tz.l.m. to this everyday object carries a lot of meaning. From this association, one implies that the human being using the camera is acting, in a way, like God. The person is creating a photograph containing a piece of reality, just as God created human beings, within whom there is a piece of the divine. Isn't this an incomparably daring (even chutzpadik) choice of word? It's almost a new interpretation of creation and a surprising positioning of human beings in the world.

Or take the word chashmal, electricity, a modern phenomenon that needed a name, one found in a prophecy by Ezekiel.

When God was revealed to Ezekiel in one of the most astounding visions in the Bible, Ezekiel said: "I looked and lo a stormy wind came sweeping… a huge cloud and flashing fire, and in the centre of it… a gleam as of chashmal…"

None of the commentators knew exactly what it was that Ezekiel saw, because this is the only appearance of the word chashmal in the entire Tanach. But when a word for electricity was needed in modern Hebrew, it was clear that this verse, which combines fire with great divine might, captures precisely the modern "power" of electricity, which to us, today, seems so unremarkable.

Or consider the word atzma'ut, independence, whose root is from the word etzem, meaning bone. What is the link between atzma'ut and etzem ? Is atzma'ut the solid, stabilizing thing within us, as Adam says following the creation of woman in Genesis: "… this one at last is a bone of my bones (etzem me'atzamai)."

Perhaps it is worthwhile to check other Biblical references for the root etzem. Is independence related to power, as it is in reference to the Israelites in Egypt: "And the people of Israel were fruitful… and became exceedingly mighty…" (vaya'atzmu).

Perhaps atzma'ut has a more lofty spiritual connotation, as in the vision revealed to the Israelites at Mount Sinai: "And they saw the God of Israel… like the very essence of heaven for clearness." (ke'etzem hashamyim).

Eliezer Ben-Yehuda [Illustration by Michael Nissimov]

Each of these possibilities invites us to define for ourselves the meanings of independence in general and Yom Ha'azmaut in particular. Do we celebrate lasting stability, might or spiritual essence?

This potential within Hebrew for bridging between the spiritual and the day-to-day symbolizes for me the potential that life in Hebrew offers. It contains a connection between the common and the holy, lowly and lofty, trivial and extraordinary. Anyone who visits Israel experiences this, and it can nourish the individual and his or her spiritual world. It is clear to me that most Israelis do not take advantage of this potential and that many are not even aware that it exists. Perhaps this is also part of the miracle of Zionism: the creation of a reality in which the Hebrew language can, if we want it to, lend spiritual meaning to everyday life.

I have no illusions about the challenges facing the Hebrew language or the State of Israel. Hebrew is evolving rapidly and is absorbing foreign words galore, especially from English and Arabic, but also from other languages. For instance, when Israelis today part from their friends, they do not say "shalom," a word whose origin is in the root for wholeness and perfection (shalem and shlemut). Rather, they say "yalla bye." – yalla (as in c'mon) comes from Arabic, while bye, of course, comes from English.

To add to this, I believe many Israelis consider Hebrew to be provincial. That is, despite living in a state with a Jewish majority, Hebrew is seen as a language of a minority, and English allows one entry onto the world at large.

On top of that, Hebrew is also a young language that must deal with the issues of the modern world, such as loaded accusations of being chauvinistic. In Hebrew, every plural that refers to people is expressed by default in the masculine gender. For example, when speaking to a group of children of both genders, a person would refer to them as "yeladim," even if some are girls. As well, many words take for granted male dominance. This is not the place to expand on this discussion, but I will mention, for example, that the word zachar – the past form of "to remember" and the word for male – is the root of the word lizkor (to remember), suggesting that memory is the purview of men.

Hebrew is a language that is not yet sure of itself. Each time a new Israeli film is released, public discussion begins once again: why is it that a love scene in Hebrew is less convincing than a comparable scene in English? Is it because we are steeped in American culture that "I love you" in movies sounds better than "Ani ohev otach?" Or is it that we don't yet know how to make Hebrew films?

In any case, a sense of historical perspective must allow us to recognize the extent of the miracle.

Ain li eretz acheret, a song by Korin Alal that has become a classic on Israeli radio in recent years, begins: "I have no other country, even if my land is burning, only a word in Hebrew penetrates my veins, my soul." As I see it, this song expresses the essence of Zionism in the 21st century, in which Hebrew is one of the basic definers of Israeli identity, a platform upon which an entire culture grows and flourishes: poetry, theatre, politics, law and literature. A culture that is prepared to ask itself the hardest questions, in its own language.

The question then arises: what is the place of Hebrew in the Diaspora? Jewish day and supplementary schools invest time, effort and thought into the teaching of Hebrew. How great is the temptation for a Tanach teacher with students of any age to teach in English rather than investing time in the translation and memorization of Hebrew words. It is clear to every teacher that by using English, the level of class discussion would rise, as would the students' level of interest. The dilemma is not simple: how do we make the special potential of Hebrew, as described above, user-friendly for Diaspora students? Is the effort required worthwhile?

Perhaps perspective is needed. Despite Israelis' aforementioned feelings of provincialism about Hebrew, and despite the Internet and the North American sensibility that the world was created in English, the language that most Jews have in common is, after all, Hebrew. And as the years go by, the community with the largest Jewish population – Israel– is getting stronger and is speaking Hebrew.

Does this statistical fact have any meaning for us in our deliberations about the importance of Hebrew in the Diaspora?

English is not my first language. During the 1½ years that I have been in Toronto as a shlichah for the Jewish Agency, I have learned a lot about how tremendously difficult it is to function, both professionally and personally, in a foreign language. This experience has helped me to better understand the challenge of learning Hebrew as a second language. (My children, of course, have a great advantage over me in second language learning, as is the case for all students in Diaspora Jewish schools).

However, in this context, I am reminded of a poem by the Israeli poet Salman Massalcha, whose first language is Arabic and who writes in Hebrew. The poem begins: "I write in Hebrew, which for me, is not my mother tongue, in order to become lost in the world; whoever does not get lost cannot find wholeness." In order words, perhaps the one who comes to Hebrew from the outside has the advantage. A deficiency in command of the language can be an asset if one relates to it in this way.

Hebrew has had astounding achievements since it was born anew. Judaic studies and Jewish philosophy are flourishing, so much so that one might have thought the verse "and from Zion shall go forth the Torah" was referring to our times.

In current Hebrew literature, there is a profound body of poetry, significant portions of which will stand the test of time and become classics within the wider culture. One of our authors, the late S.Y. Agnon, earned the Nobel Prize for literature in 1966, and there are others who are worthy of it.

Will Diaspora Jewry be wise enough to listen in on what is happening across the ocean? Will it take advantage of the opportunity to broaden its cultural and spiritual horizons? Will it recognize the greatness of the miracle?

How does one say it in Hebrew? Halevay (would that it be so).

Just the facts, ma'am

Two unrelated court cases were recently resolved. One was a Canadian case with possible international implications, the other was heard before the Supreme Court of Israel.

Norma Baumel Joseph in Montreal

Both cases were lengthy, although the Israeli one took an inordinate amount of time – 14 years – to resolve. I am intrigued by how judges are– or are not – bound to consider only the facts of a case.

In Canada, a judge decided in favour of a divorced woman who sued her husband for damages. Although the financial rewards were below those requested, the ruling benefited the plaintiff. The man had promised in a separate document to give his wife a get – a Jewish divorce – but did not do so for 15 years. Based only on the facts of the case, the judge ruled the man contravened a voluntary civil agreement, hence the woman was entitled to damages.

Appropriately, this decision did not invoke issues of religion and state, nor did it involve the federal divorce law often called the "get amendment." The ruling will influence jurisprudence on damages and divorce. It might also strengthen prenuptial agreements. It most definitely should encourage divorcing couples to be legally explicit about their get requirements.

Significantly, it stands as an argument for rulings based on case facts only.

In that sense, the second case is an antithesis of the first. Last month, the Supreme Court of Israel ruled the Women of the Wall can pray out loud and as a group at Robinson's Arch, a section of the Western Wall outside the Western Wall Plaza, but not at the plaza itself.

In 1988, some women, myself included, began praying at the Western Wall Plaza – commonly known as the Kotel – with Torah and tallitot. As violence against us escalated, the government passed an injunction prohibiting this form of women's group prayer at the Kotel. Subsequently, the Supreme Court agreed to hear our case.

The facts were always about the Kotel and never about Robinson's Arch. How did the court get diverted? Were the political considerations more regnant than the legal ones?

The case presents many legal firsts. This was the first time in history the religious prerogatives of Jewish women have been decided in a court of law. It is noteworthy that the courts did not find any halachic violation in our conduct. The final decision was based on fear of riots by those who oppose women's prayer at the Kotel, rather than facts of commission by the women.

Previous rulings indicated the government should find a way to satisfy both groups, but the court refrained from issuing directives to the state.

In the end, the ruling released the court from making a decision on the merits of the case and avoided political fallout. It was an act of abdication, not justice.

Lessons of Lag b'Omer: bonfires, bows and arrows

Jean M. Gerber in Vancouver

Last year, on our sixth visit to Israel, we finally made it to a Lag b'Omer bonfire extravaganza. After a short walk from where we stay in Ramat Hasharon, we found ourselves in the midst of dozens of celebratory bonfires. Not only were participants happily burning smoky pieces of wood, they were popping firecrackers, sparklers and dispensing masses of food.

My favourite was one of the last hearths we visited – a North African celebration, complete with drumming and enthusiastic harmonies.

The smoke from the fires was still in the air the next day, a pungent haze covering the sky above the Tel Aviv suburb.

It wasn't until this year that I began to wonder just what Lag b'Omer was all about, so I headed for my trusty encyclopedias – the classic 1912 Jewish Encyclopedia and the most recent Encyclopedia Judaica. Yes, I knew about the story that on the 33rd day between Passover and Shavuot, the plague that had killed thousands of Rabbi Akiva's students was halted. But that seemed, well, a bit apocryphal. Surely there was more to it than that.

This is what I learned. The Talmud mentions the plague – Rabbi Akiva's students are said to have died of a plague during the Bar Kochba rebellion "because they did not respect each other" – but mourning during the Omer is only mentioned explicitly first in the 8th century CE in a responsum of Natroni Gaon in Babylonia. Maimonides doesn't mention it at all.

In later centuries, the period of mourning gathered other catastrophes to it, the massacre of Jews during the Crusades being just one. Like Tisha b'Av, it became a period of recalling various times of death and suffering.

Rabbi Akiva was known to be a supporter of Bar Kochba, declaring him the King Messiah, and so some conjecture that the rabbi's students were actually soldiers in this devastating, and ultimately futile, uprising against the Romans.

Others suggest Lag b'Omer might have marked a brief victory in that war, or that it's the day when the manna began. According to the kabbalists, it was the day Rabbi Shimon bar Yohai, whom they regard as the author of the Zohar, died. As they believe that on the day of his death he revealed many secrets to his followers, and the world was filled with light, the fires and holiday are a symbol of these luminous mysteries.

Some suggest that Rabbi Akiva's student soldiers died because they fought in an uncoordinated and unco-operative way – or that we celebrate because they did fight together and on this day were victorious!

You can take your pick of theories as to why we celebrate Lag b'Omer with fire. It could be in memory of the mystic Rabbi Shimon bar Yohai – or the scholar Rabbi Akiva and his students, or the failure of the Bar Kochba uprising (or a brief success).

To bring in another explanation, Lag b'Omer could be a much-changed version of a pagan holiday whose origins and ceremonies blended with Jewish stories. This latter reason is connected to the bows and arrows children play with on that day.

By contrast, the kabbalists connect the bow with a rainbow that will appear just before the coming of the messiah.

So we come back to the messianic, which deluded Rabbi Akiva. When he proclaimed Bar Kochba to be the King Messiah, one of his colleagues is supposed to have said:"Akiva, grass will sprout from your cheeks, and the messiah will not have come!"

It's an ageless lesson that religious fervor and politics make a lethal brew. Religion and politics, as Israel and other states have discovered, can be a disaster.

Some Jews today see the rebirth of Israel as heralding the end of time. Others hear approaching messianic footsteps in the settler movement, or in world events that appear more and more extreme.

The lesson I would take is different.

Rabbi Akiva, a genius in all other ways, was tragically wrong and led his students to their deaths. For me, the lesson of the Omer and of Lag b'Omer is that we can't wait for such apocalyptic salvation. It's up to us to repair the world, to build with human hands a just society here and in Israel. Thus, we will survive, or perish, by our own deeds.

Can't let go of camp – and proud of it

Stuart Slayen in Winnipeg

I can't tell you what I had for lunch yesterday, but I can sing my entire Camp Massad Gezah Baneem cabin song from 1976. It was to the tune of Sammy Davis Jr.'s Candyman and we were called the Cochaveem (Stars). The following summer, we were the Machos and our cabin song was written by our counsellors to the tune of Close to You by the Carpenters. (I was 11 and, at the time, I thought the Carpenters were the people who fixed our cabin.)

I went to Camp Massad – a Hebrew immersion camp in Winnipeg Beach, Man. – as a camper from 1976 to 1981. I served on staff until 1990, missing only 1984 for a summer trip to Israel. My last four years at Massad were spent as the director. I've since been back for two alumni reunions and one family weekend.

I sing, er, I mean, mouth, in the Camp Massad Alumni Choir. I sat on the board for about a decade and still sit on one committee. A few hours before I wrote this column, my wife and I made a commitment to the camp's endowment fund through the Jewish Foundation of Manitoba. (It's not a huge gift by many standards, and the camp was not crazy about my desire to pay it off in just under 2,000 years. Still, for us, it was an expression of passion for the camp and Jewish camping in general.)

My Massadnik friends and I still reminisce about the camp days, and much of our humour and discourse is influenced by a two-decade-old shtick first celebrated on the shores of Lake Winnipeg.

What is it about Camp Massad that has stuck with me so dramatically?

Sure, Massad was fun, but a kid can have fun rolling around in the mud, too. At Massad, fun was – and is – just a tool to deliver the really important stuff. I think Massad sticks because it represents what we all need – simple, positive Jewish experiences. Massad was Hebrew without the tests, shul without the necktie. A summer at Massad was a licence to create, take risks and feel really good about being Jewish.

As beautiful and inspiring as Jewish living can be, a Jewish life can be complicated. We struggle with degrees of observance. We worry about the future of the Middle East and figure out how to best support Israel. We get involved in communal politics. We deal with difficult decisions about education for our children and care for our elders.

Camp was never complicated. It was intentionally simple. And perhaps it's that simplicity that I and many others long for in our lives. Singing a camp Shabbat melody today isn't just about nostalgia. It's about trying to draw on the memories to awaken the soul. The songs, the jokes, the personalities all trigger that inner peace that came with a summer at Massad.

In a few weeks, my wife, kids and I will spend a couple of days at Camp Massad for a family weekend. My kids will barely sleep. They'll eat too many treats. They'll likely resist participating in some of the activities.

But they'll also stare in awe as the counsellors raise the roof off of the auditorium with a deafening, spirited rendition of Chiribim. They'll do Israeli dancing. They'll sing Shabbat songs with 100 other people. They'll cuddle with Mommy and Daddy around a bonfire.

Their positive Jewish experiences today will be their positive Jewish memories tomorrow.

So, as I look forward to our weekend at camp, I'm reminded of my youth. I'm reminded of happy times and exciting experiences. I'm reminded that when Jewish organizations bring Jewish people together –to do Jewish things – greatness can occur. Simply.

The Kirshner File

The sabra: a thread in the fabric of Zionism

In the numbing aftermath of Yitzhak Rabin's assassination in 1995, Israel's airwaves resounded to the lilting melodies of Natan Yonatan's nostalgic song, Where Are There Still Men Like That Man?

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

For a moment during those sad days, the whole country seemed yet again to embrace the myth of the fair-haired, blue-eyed sabra, of whom Rabin was an archetype.

Usually of Ashkenazi stock, sabras were the first generation of Israeli Jews to be educated and socialized within the labour movement of the Yishuv, the Jewish community in Mandatory Palestine.

Drilled in Hebrew language and socialist Zionist ideals, they were moulded by iconic institutions: kibbutzim, moshavim, agricultural youth villages, the Palmach and, later, elite units of the Israel Defence Forces.

Likened to a prickly pear cactus, which is sharp on the outside but pulpy inside, the sabra was supposedly a person whose rough exterior hid a sensitive soul.

A generic term for native-born Israelis, the word sabra was coined by Uri Kesari in the newspaper Do'ar Ha-Yom on April 18, 1931. But it was journalist Uri Avneri in 1946 who first expressed his generational consciousness through the concept of the sabra.

According to Oz Almog, the author of The Sabra: The Creation of the New Jew (University of California Press), a discerning and well-written book about an essential component of Israeli history, the sabra's prestige peaked during and after the 1948 War of Independence. This was a period when most Israelis tended to attribute the war's achievements to the sabra and the new immigrants steeped in their values.

The sabra's image was burnished by newspaper stories, by victory albums and by novels, poems, songs, movies and plays.

Almog, a senior lecturer in sociology at Emek Yezreel College, explains that Zionist-oriented schools, with their emphasis on Hebrew, Jewish history and physical fitness, were the incubators of the "cult" of the sabra.

Textbooks that challenged the fundamental assumptions of Zionism were omitted from the curriculum. The Bible was studied from a secular, nationalist perspective, and Hebrew culture was glorified. An atmosphere of what the poet Chaim Nachman Bialik called "unconscious ideological instruction" pervaded the classroom.

During the War of Independence and the 1956 Sinai Campaign, teachers encouraged students to intensify their emotional participation in the national experience by writing letters to soldiers on the front. Pupils' sense of involvement in the Zionist enterprise was reinforced through the medium of school assemblies paying tribute to fallen soldiers.

From the 1920s onward, an integral aspect of Zionist education was a love of nature and an appreciation of the country's landscape. Texts dwelled on a mixture of topics, from geography to Hebrew literature. The underlying assumption was that Jews should learn about the land, not only for practical and intellectual purposes, but for ideological reasons as well.

Field trips, hikes, marches and farm work were also supposed to foster a deep attachment to the land, as were tree-planting ceremonies and the Festival of the First Fruits, Succot, which commemorated Zionism's success in working the soil.

Marches were of particular significance, Almog suggests. With Israel's establishment, marches organized by Gadna – the para-military youth group – turned into exhibitions of national strength and vitality.

These marches morphed into treks in which participants scaled cliffs and crossed hostile Arab borders. Petra, the ruined Nabatean bastion in Jordan, was probably the most popular of these dangerous off-road adventures.

The historic right of Jews to Eretz Yisrael was a common theme running through the Zionist curriculum, and it was never seriously questioned until after the 1967 Six Day War.

The ethos of heroism and national pride was conveyed through lessons about biblical figures such as David and Judah Maccabee and about Zionist stalwarts such as A.D. Gordon and Josef Trumpeldor, the martyr of Tel Chai ("It is good to die for our country").

As might be expected in a society that valued collectivist values, volunteerism was an important benchmark by which a person was judged. The willingness and ability to sacrifice oneself for the nation, especially in military service, became a personal standard of worth, "a mirror in which a sabra compared himself to others."

Promoting an anti-Diaspora mentality, the curriculum glorified the Land of Israel and underscored the persistence of pogroms to demonstrate that Jewish life in foreign nations was pointless. In this connection, sabra were taught to regard themselves as the polar opposites of the stereotypical galut Jews.

As a result, until the mid-1950s at least, sabras usually displayed a superior and patronizing attitude toward Diaspora Jews and a certain insensitivity regarding the Holocaust.

The practice of giving sabras Hebrew names from the Bible and the land itself, and of Hebraicizing European family names, came into vogue during the First Aliyah (1882-1903).

The stereotypical sabra

During the heyday of the sabra "cult," sabras affected a deliberately dishevelled appearance: haphazard clothes, short, unkempt hair with forelocks, tanned skin and a dust-encrusted face.

For a while, simple khaki dress, which was supposed to evoke simplicity, modesty, idealism and anti-style, was all the rage, as was bedouin headdress.

Bare feet, simple leather sandals, bare-chestedness and tousled forelocks – the blorit – became the stuff of legend in literature, poetry, painting, caricatures, posters and film.

Makeup for women was frowned upon and considered almost whorish.

Dugri, the concise, pointed and unpolished colloquial Hebrew of sabras, fortified their cocksure, arrogant and impertinent attitude. But deep down, Dugri was seen as a sign of honesty and of the courage to speak boldly, without embellishment or prevarication.

Thanks to the sabras' influence, Hebrew was buoyed by a skein of slang words – ranging from davka (exactly so) and kachah (just because) to betach (of course) and me'ah achuz (without a doubt).

Israeli folk dances, principally the horah, and sing-a-longs, were defining features of sabra culture, too.

Tapping into Yiddish, Russian, Oriental and chassidic traditions, Zionist folk songs celebrated nature and work, children, holidays and, after the War of Independence, the experience of conflict, loss and memory.

Songs such as Bab-el-Wad, On the Negev Plains, Dudu and Believe Me, The Day Will Come became quasi anthems and were sung with gusto at festive occasions.

A tradition known as the kumzitz, which evolved from pioneer days, was immensely popular. Sabras would prepare a campfire, cook the meal, dance the horah and sit cross-legged on the ground in a circle of conversation.

The kumzitz may sound corny today, but in its day it generated a kind of closeness, togetherness and solidarity that are all too absent in Israel now.

Almog claims that the identity of the mythical sabra was burnished by three factors.

• Sabras were lauded in hagiographic memorial books published to mark the War of Independence and the Sinai Campaign.

The military deeds of Israeli heroes – Moshe Dayan and Meir Har-Tzion, to mention but two – were romanticized and favourably compared to biblical conquerors. And after the 1967 Six Day War, the exploits of Israeli pilots were widely publicized.

• Sabras, drawing on their diaries, letters and poems, published a plethora of books to much acclaim.

• Sabras had much greater access to printing presses and publishing houses than new immigrants.

By the end of the 1960s, a new generation of writers, playwrights, poets, journalists and scholars began challenging the sabras' "ideological derivativeness and their one-dimensional view of reality," Almog writes.

And a critical, anti-establishment Zionist canon, which coincided with the War of Atttrition and the Yom Kippur War, virtually shattered the aura of the sabra as a role model, he adds.

Since the 1970s, this critique has entrenched itself, as sacred cows of Zionism have been taken out to pasture.

But in Almog's mind, the sabra was an immensely pivotal figure in Israeli mythology – an indelible thread in the fabric of modern Zionism.

Happy Birthday Israel!

Associated Hebrew Schools of Toronto

As a Zionist school, we foster a strong emotional bond with Israel all year long. We teach the children about the miracles and achievements of the State of Israel, and on Yom Ha'atzmaut, we dedicate the day to celebrating. Children wear blue and white and parade with Israeli flags. Our morning prayers are festive and we recite Hallel. The assembly begins with a solemn ceremony paying tribute to our fallen soldiers. The "birthday party" includes Israeli dancing and singing, and of course, Israeli treats. Yom Ha'atzmaut is a day of celebration and joy. To make the holiday complete, school dismisses at noon.

Canadian Friends of Boys Town honours two couples

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

For the first time, Canadian Friends of Boys Town Jerusalem (BTJ) is honouring two couples at its tribute dinner, to be held May 15 at Shaarei Shomayim Congregation.

Harriet and Brian Morris and Frances and Jules Kronis, are being honoured for their support of BTJ, and for their contribution to the Canadian Jewish community.

Brian Morris, a lawyer, is past national chair of the Canada-Israel Committee and past national president of B'nai Brith Canada. He is also a board member of BTJ, Canadian Magen David Adom and Associated Hebrew Schools.

Harriet Kravitz-Morris holds a PhD and has lectured at York University and University of Toronto. She has also been co-editor of fiction for Parchment, a journal of Canadian-Jewish writing, and is the immediate past national co-chair of the B'nai Brith League for Human Rights. She has served on the boards of B'nai Brith, the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto and UJA Federation's Board of Jewish Education.

Jules and Frances Kronis

Jules Kronis, a lawyer, has been on the national advisory board of B'nai Brith Canada, has been honorary legal counsel for Jewish National Fund, legal counsel and director of State of Israel Bonds and an executive of BTJ.

Frances Kronis, who has a master's degree in science specializing in virology, has lectured at the Toronto Institute of Medical Technology and the faculty of medicine at the University of Toronto. She is now a manager in enterprise practice for a chartered accountancy firm. She has also been a canvasser for several Jewish causes, including UJA Federation.

Harriet and Brian Morris

In an interview prior to the dinner, Brian Morris said that BTJ, a technological school for about 1,000 boys, many of whom come from economically disadvantaged families, "has been part of Israeli fabric since the country's inception.

"The school has staying power; it must be doing everything right. It was a Zionist idea that was well fertilized, and it should be on everyone's support list," he said.

Kravitz-Morris said BTJ is integral to the State of Israel.

"The boys go on to serve in the army, and when the air force started making its own planes, Boys Town was there. The boys that come out of the school form the backbone of Israel.

"The school has been around a long time, yet it is not in the daily news. It's newsworthy, but it is not part of the daily broadcasts. It needs to be brought to public attention.

"Boys Town is honouring us, but it is our honour to be able to support Boys Town and raise its level in the community," she said.

This year, when Israel has cut funding to a lot of institutions, "we have to make an extra effort to help out," Kravitz-Morris said

Jules Kronis said he can identify with the students at Boys Town. "I attended a downtown high school and I had to put myself through university. Most of these boys come from an economically deprived background, and this is their break.

"Some boys come from countries with political problems, and Israel is a haven for them."

Supporting an educational institution is important to the Kronises, Frances Kronis said, "because Jules got where he is because of his education."

It is their duty to help out said Jules, 59, because "I believe in the transition of generations. We have to step up and actively ensure the survival and viability of the State of Israel.

"It is not enough to buy tickets. Some had to take a pro-active role. I regret that not enough of our generation is doing that."

Tribute co-chairs are Harold Meyer and Eli Rubinstein.

JVS spearheading effort to help Argentine Jews

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

JVS Toronto is looking for other organizations to join its Community Task Force for Aiding Argentine Jews.

The group was established in February with half a dozen organizations, but there are all kinds of initiatives going on in the city, according to Anat Wertheim, JVS' vice-president of employment and training.

"We would like to co-ordinate ourselves a little better in terms of the kind of assistance we can provide to this group," she told The CJN.

Task force would like to provide social and/or financial support

Jewish immigrants from Argentina "go to synagogue, to JVS and to JIAS. They are all over," said Wertheim. In addition to co-ordinating efforts for new immigrants, the task force would like to provide social and/or financial support for Jews in Argentina.

Participants in the task force, which is chaired by Daphne Wagner, include UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, Jewish Immigrant Aid Services, Holy Blossom Temple, Temple Kol Ami and Ve'ahavta, the Canadian Jewish Humanitarian & Relief Committee.

In addition to professional mentoring, the task force is looking at how to help newcomers from Argentina integrate into the Jewish community. Probably a couple of hundred – most of whom are professionals in their 20s, 30s and 40s with good English skills – have used the services of JVS in the past year or two, said Wertheim. "We would like to invite other organizations that have their own initiatives to the table, to see how we can co-ordinate our efforts in an efficient and effective way," said Wertheim.

The group effort, Wertheim's idea, came about after JVS was asked to help Argentine Jews find jobs and qualify for landed immigrant status, she said.

Although she knows of no other task force in Canada, Wertheim noted that the Jewish communities in Montreal and Winnipeg also have initiatives in place to help Argentine immigrants.

The task force's next meeting is scheduled for May 28. For further information, contact Anat Wertheim at awertheim@jvstoronto.org

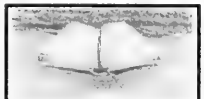
Rabbi Shimon & Wal-Mart

By RABBI AARON MITNICK

As Lag b'Omer fast approaches, I wonder: am I the only one for whom the mysterious holiday automatically brings to mind the great Rabbi Shimon bar Yochai and the great retailer Wal-Mart?

All right, maybe I am the only one. But please allow me to explain why.



I think we're all familiar with Wal-Mart, so let's move on to Rabbi Shimon bar Yochai.

On Lag b'Omer, we celebrate Rabbi Shimon's yartzeit, but just who was he? And what did he do that was so important that he merited having a day set aside on the Jewish calendar in his honour?

One reason given is that Rabbi Shimon was able to grasp, and teach to his disciples, some of the most mystical concepts of Judaism. On the day of his death, he passed on many of these sublime secrets of creation, which formed the basis of the seminal kabbalistic work, the Zohar.

Fine, but I still don't see why that wins the get-a-holiday-in-your-honour grand prize, when there are plenty of other Jewish greats – Moses and Abraham are just two that quickly pop to mind – who weren't accorded the same distinction.

I think the answer lies in how Rabbi Shimon was seen by the rabbis down through the generations. He is always cited as the exemplar of "toraso umnaso," meaning his vocation, his very raison d'être, was Torah study.

There's a fascinating story the Talmud recounts about Rabbi Shimon that illustrates this. At one point in his life, a bounty was placed on Rabbi Shimon's head by the Roman ruler of Israel, and Rabbi Shimon was forced to flee. The Talmud tells us that he and his son spent the next 13 years secluded in a cave and did nothing other than study Torah the entire time. They survived on the fruit of a nearby carob tree and a spring of water.

You're probably thinking: what in the world does any of this have to do with Wal-Mart?

The answer: Rabbi Shimon's total separation from the physical world and single-minded devotion to the Torah is the complete opposite of the physical side of life that Wal-Mart represents.

Don't get the wrong idea. Judaism certainly doesn't advocate everyone running away and living in caves. In fact, I love Wal-Mart – with quality merchandise, excellent value and friendly service, what's not to love?

The problem lies in overindulging in the Wal-Mart side of life, in getting caught up in the plethora of distractions that make up modern life: acquiring the latest in high-tech gadgetry, television, sports, the Internet… the list goes on and on. Of course, none of these is inherently bad, but together they constitute an almost irresistible force that draws us away from what we know deep inside that life is really all about.

And that's where Rabbi Shimon bar Yochai comes in. He reminds us – indeed, confronts us – not to lose sight of who we really are: spiritual beings who long to connect with that side of ourselves and with God.

And that's a message that deserves its own date on the calendar.

Rabbi Mitnick is spiritual leader of Beth Zion Congregation in Oshawa, Ont.

Examining Jewish mysticism

EHYEH: A Kabbalah for Tomorrow by Arthur Green, Jewish Lights Publishing, $21. 95 US.

Zohar: Annotated & Explained by Daniel C. Matt, Skylight Paths Publishing, $15.95 US, paperback.

Kabbalah, the ancient mystical tradition of Judaism, reached its most mature development in the 12th and 13th centuries with the appearance of the Zohar (the Book of Radiance). This influential work in Aramaic by the Spanish scholar, Leon De Modena, included teachings and insights from earlier sources.

In Safed in the 16th century, mystical ideas were recast and reinterpreted by Isaac Luria (the Ari) and his followers. The kabbalistic teaching, its intricate and elaborate language of symbolism, the involved interpretations by which the Kabbalists sought to reconcile their ideas with biblical and rabbinic teaching, made it a closed study for most Jews.

In the 18th century a new kind of popular mysticism emerged in eastern Europe. Known as Chassidism, it aimed to simplify the kabbalistic teachings and make them accessible to anyone. Opening yourself to the Divine Presence that is within you and all about you became the immediate goal of this Jewish mysticism. The Chassidim cared little for esoteric lore, seeking only to serve God with joy and wholeness of heart.

In EHYEH, Rabbi Arthur Green, professor of Jewish thought at Brandeis University and former president of the Reconstructionist Rabbinical College, points out that modern men and women are less confident about the steadiness of progress in many areas of human endeavour than were preceding generations. They seek to re-examine the more profound tools of human self-understanding that were cast aside with the advent of modernity. Kabbalah is one of these, and in this spirit they open themselves to learning from it.

As a sophisticated and modern seeker of mystical wisdom the author asks questions such as these: How is the kabbalistic tradition relevant to today's seeker? Are the ancient and mysterious symbols of value to us in a very different world? How should Kabbalah be refitted so that it might serve as an appropriate vehicle for a contemporary spiritual quest?

The author offers 14 personal teachings that he regards as essential for living a Jewish spiritual life in our day.

Some of these are:

Know that all of life is holy, all exists within the One. There is no time or place in which God's presence cannot be found. Meditate on this each day. Think about it at home, while commuting, at work and back at home.

Live the rhythm of the sacred calendar – Shabbat, holidays, seasons – as rich with traditional forms or as simply as your spirit desires. Remember that it is you who has to fill those forms with God's presence. It is the joy of your spirit that brings them to life!

Share with others the fullness of spirit that flows from your religious life. Give to others beyond measure, just as no one has measured the great gifts you receive. Give of yourself: give time, not just money; give directly, not just impersonally. Above all, give love.

Recognize every person as the image of God. Work to see the Divine Image especially in those who themselves seem oblivious to it. Seek out the divinity in those who annoy, anger or frustrate you. Hope to find and uplift sparks of holy light, even where it seems hardest.

For those interested in Jewish mysticism the author presents a rich, informed and intelligent examination of the complex subject.

Prof. Daniel Matt, in his valuable and groundbreaking little book, offers brief selections from the Zohar and then in a facing-page commentary, brings meaning and life to them.

Yiddishe Mamas – Part 2

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Mother's Day may be over, but that doesn't mean you should stop thinking about your wonderful mother. Today a look at Jewish mothers in books, film and humour.

If you want to read about some real Jewish mothers who have brought up famous boys and girls, take a look at the Jewhoo site. Fred Bernstein interviewed Beatty Rutman (Bob Dylan), Florence Hoffman (Abbie Hoffman), Leah Adler (Steven Spielberg) and many others for the book The Official Jewish Mothers' Hall of Fame. The book is now out of print, but Bernstein is reprinting the interviews online. [http://www.jewhoo.com/editor/interviews]

French writer Bruno Halioua has recently written a book titled Mères juives des hommes célèbres (Jewish mothers of famous men) for which he researched 13 mothers of distinction. Here's a great anecdote Halioua uncovered: "Did you know that Albert Einstein sent a telegram to his mother when he won the Nobel Prize in 1921, which read: 'Mother – WE won the Nobel Prize'?" [http://www.jrep.com/Books/Article-15.html] You can find a list online of dozens of books that feature Jewish mothers in fact and fiction. [http://www.fetchbook.info/Jewish_Mothers.html]

Menlo Park, Calif.'s Esther Heller has compiled a Mother's Day list of some of her favourite Jewish mothers, women she feels don't reinforce sexism and anti-Semitism. Among her choices are Betty Friedan, founder of the National Organization of Women; Beverly Sills, soprano and director of the New York City Opera; and Dr. Ruth Westheimer (Doctor Ruth), psychosexual therapist and broadcaster. [http://www.newbridges.org/Newsletter/5_99/news599_mom.html] You don't have to have a famous son or daughter to be a proud Yiddishe mama. The Atlanta Jewish Times profiles five lovely Jewish mothers. [http://www.atljewishtimes.com/archives/1999/050799cs.htm]

After you finish reading all about Jewish mothers, you can watch them on the silver screen, often as hectoring, self-sacrificing stereotypes. Australian filmmaker Monique Schwartz was curious about the portrayal of mothers, so she decided to dig a bit and she created Mamadrama: The Jewish Mother in Cinema. Schwartz analyzes Jewish mothers on the screen in Yiddish movies including Mirele Efros (1939), American films such as Portnoy's Complaint (1972), My Favorite Year (1982), and The Jazz Singer (1927), and Israeli pictures like Noa at 17 (1981) and Summer of Aviya (1988). At the same time, Schwartz tries to reconcile the screen mamas' image with her own Jewish mother. You can read a feature article on the filmmaker at Australia's RealTime Web site. [http://www.realtimearts.net/rt46/stewart.html]

And finally, there are Jewish mother jokes. Telling them is like walking a tightwire between a having good laugh and perpetuating a painful stereotype… as a Toronto radio station found out. When a host told a "How many Jewish mothers does it take to change a light bulb?" joke, a listener complained that it was anti-Semitic and offensive. The radio station apologized and said no malice or offence was intended. The Canadian Broadcast Standards Council agreed, ruling that the joke was not a breach of its code of ethics since it did not attack or demean and was told in the context of "light bulb" jokes aimed at other groups. [http://www.cbsc.ca/english/archive/9704.htm] You can look at some Jewish mother jokes and decide whether you think they are funny [http://makeashorterlink.com/?125632C54] or not. [http://makeashorterlink.com/?Z23666C54]

However, I will venture out on that tightwire and leave you with a classic joke I found on the Web: [http://www.clean-funnies.com/html/f695.htm]

The married daughter calls.

"Hello, Ma."

"Shirley, darling, what's wrong?"

"Oh, Ma. Both the kids are sick with the flu. The fridge has just broken down. The sink is leaking. In two hours my Hadassah group is coming for lunch."

"Don't worry. I'm going to get on a bus and go into the city, take the train out to Long Island and walk the two miles to your house. I'll take care of the kids, cook a nice lunch for the Hadassah ladies, and I'll even make dinner for Barry."

"Barry – who's Barry?"

"Barry – your husband!!"

"But my husband's name is Steve."

"Is this 555-1212?"

"No, this is 555-1221."

(Pause) "Does that mean you're not coming?"

Read Palestinian claims carefully

MYTH:

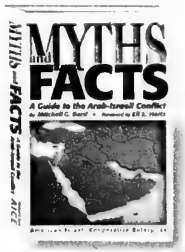
FACT:

Palestinians have learned that they can disseminate almost any information to the media and it will be published or broadcast somewhere. Once it is picked up by one media outlet, it is inevitably repeated by others. Misinformation can quickly take on the appearance of fact, and while Israel can present evidence to correct the inaccuracies being reported, the damage is usually already done. Once an image or impression is in someone's mind, it is often difficult, if not impossible, to erase it.



It is said that there are three types of lies: lies, damn lies and statistics. One staple of Palestinian propaganda has been to distribute false statistics, in an effort to make Israeli actions look monstrous.

For example, if an incident involves any death or destruction, the figures can be grossly exaggerated and the media will repeat the fabricated data until the information becomes widely accepted as accurate.

This occurred, for instance, during the Lebanon War when Yasser Arafat's brother claimed that Israel's operations had left 600,000 Lebanese homeless. He made the number up, but it was repeated by the International Committee of the Red Cross and publicized in the media. By the time the ICRC repudiated the figure, it was too late to change the impression that Israel's military operation to defend itself from terrorist attacks on its northern border had created an unconscionable refugee problem (Washington Post, June 25, 1982).

This happened again after Israel's operation in Jenin in April 2002 when Palestinian spokesperson Saeb Erekat told CNN on April 17 that at least 500 people were massacred and 1,600 people, including women and children, were missing. Erekat could produce no evidence for his claim and, in fact, the Palestinians' own review committee reported a death toll of 56, of whom 34 were combatants. No women or children were reported missing (New York Post, May 3, 2002).

What is perhaps more outrageous than the repetition of Erekat's lie is that media outlets continue to treat him as a legitimate spokesperson, which allows him to regularly disseminate misinformation.

If American officials were ever found to have lied to the press, they would lose all credibility and then would have little or no chance of being given a forum to express their views.

BJE's Bernard Shoub set to retire

A man who has played an integral role in developing Toronto's much-admired Jewish educational system, and who is largely responsible for the development of the new provincial private school tax credit, is calling it a career after 26 years on the job.

Bernard Shoub, who began his role as Director of School Finances at the UJA Federation Board of Jewish Education in 1977, will be stepping down this summer, bringing the end to an extremely successful career.

Born in Montreal, Shoub, a 67-year-old father of three and grandfather of seven, has always been interested in looking after the children – and not just his own.

Montreal's loss became Toronto's gain following an education study that was undertaken in Toronto in 1975. Following that study, Toronto's Board of Jewish Education – which was expanding at that time – needed a Director of School Finance.

In 1977, after he got the job in Toronto, Shoub took the first set of guidelines dealing with the administration of the tuition subsidies, designed by Steven Freedhof, then-tuition Chairman of Associated Hebrew School, and began to reconstruct them. UJA Federation provides $7 million a year in tuition subsidies for families that cannot afford full fees at Jewish Day Schools.

"Bernie Shoub is a man who has dedicated his professional life to Jewish children," says Seymour Epstein, Vice President, Jewish Education, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto.

Shoub's experience in Jewish education began many years before his arrival in Toronto when, as a volunteer, he chaired Montreal's Association for the Advancement of Jewish Education.

It was Bernard Shoub who, along with Aaron Blumenfeld, Ira Wolfish, and Simon Rosenblum, of Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario Region, headed up negotiations with the provincial government about how provincial education tax credits would be applied.

"The government had a number of concerns relating to the tax credit, particularly what they feared was double-dipping," says Shoub. "They worried about parents receiving provincial and federal tax credits for the same tuition. We allayed their fears with a proposal prepared by economist Jack Mintz."

Bernard Shoub

While Shoub is obviously delighted to see the fruition of his hard work pay off with the new tax credit in effect, there is still one issue that requires further exploration.

"Grandparents who pay tuition for their grandchildren are not eligible for the provincial tax credit, plain and simple," he says. "The only ones currently eligible are parents or legal guardians."

While Toronto's Jewish education system has expanded dramatically during his 26 years, Shoub says that one thing remains the same. "The unique level of support and dedication from the community to our Jewish educational system has been spectacular from day one, and continues to be so today," he says.

Despite all of his accomplishments, Shoub is most proud of his commitment to what he calls community building. "That's something I feel very strongly about," he says. "Whether it's through the Administrators and Principals Conferences, or when I co-chaired UJA Federation's Education Division, it's important to involve everyone from the secular to the religious, from large schools or the smallest. That is the way to build one community."

"Bernie Shoub is man of complete devotion, dedication and commitment, never leaving a figure or a fact unturned if it will help the cause of Jewish education," adds Epstein.

81-year-old man shares his knowledge of all things Jewish

For more than 10 years, a Toronto man has been quietly volunteering behind the scenes at Toronto's Lipa Green Building, and his contributions have made an important impact on the Jewish community.

David Forberg, 81, has been lending his extensive knowledge – as well as his impressive collection - of "all-things-Jewish" – to the Media Centre at UJA Federation's Board of Jewish Education, where countless teachers and students alike are benefiting from his generosity.

"Even though I'm retired, I felt that I could still be of use by contributing to the Media Centre," says Forberg. "I love everything Jewish. I'm not a particularly religious man, but when it comes to tzedakah, I'm there in any way that I'm needed."

Forberg spent many years accumulating an impressive video library, some of which he has contributed to the Centre. Even today he spends much of his time looking for treasures of knowledge, including books, records, and videos. In all, the Media Centre – located on the second floor of the Lipa Green Building – boasts more than 2,600 videotapes, tens of thousands of slides, and well over 10,000 audiotapes.

"I've known him for many years and immediately I was amazed by his knowledge of Jewish history," says Ahivu Bar-El, who retired last summer after 21 years as the Centre's Media Director. "He's not a teacher or a scholar, yet David knows so much about everything, and he loves to share that knowledge with all the visitors who come to the Media Centre. Because of David, they always went home satisfied with what they learned."

Dave and Syma Forberg enjoy spending time with one of their great grandchildren

Unfortunately, much of Forberg's knowledge of the Holocaust was learned firsthand in a concentration camp in Poland where he met the love of his life, Syma.

After losing their entire families during the Holocaust, David and Syma moved to Toronto in 1948 to start a new life. Their children, Joe and Honey, were born in a German Displaced Persons camp, while their other children, Esther and Bill, were born at Toronto's Mount Sinai Hospital in Old Yorkville. Daughters and sons-in-law Kathy Forberg, Gail Forberg, Larry Silverberg and Albert Michaels have become an integral part of the family that has become the future of these Holocaust survivors.

"David is such a pleasant, good-natured mensch," says Brahm Goldfarb, Director of the Media Centre. "The thing that strikes you about him immediately is how much of himself he has given to the Centre so that everybody else can learn about Jewish history. David thinks it's absolutely vital to have any and all Jewish history available at the Centre."

"As a Holocaust survivor, I especially tend to look for materials relating to the Nazis," says Forberg. "I like to know everything possible about our history as Jews starting from Adam and Eve right up until today. It's also essential that we educate our children today - especially with this new rise of anti-Semitism. That's another reason why the Media Centre is so important."

During their early years in Toronto, David worked hard as an upholsterer, while Syma raised their four kids and ran a rooming house in order to save money for a business down the road. Eventually, their hard work paid off as Star Chrome Manufacturing was born in 1952 and went on to become the second largest dinette manufacturing company in Canada. In 1984, he sold the business and retired.

Finally, after all of their hard work, David and Syma Forberg can spend some time doing what they love most, spending time with their 10 grandchildren and enjoying the thrill of seven great-grandchildren. Obviously a history buff, he also enjoys anthropology, religion, geography and travel.

"It's funny," adds Goldfarb. "Sometimes David will worry when he's addressing a group of visitors to the Media Centre, and he'll say, 'I'm talking too much, aren't I'? But like we always tell him, for a man like David0 Forberg, there's no way that he could ever be accused of talking too much."

UJA goes wireless at Windsor Arms

More than 160 young business people recently attended a UJA Federation Jewish Chamber of Commerce (JCOC) event with keynote speaker, Jim Balsillie, Co-CEO of Research in Motion, creator of the Blackberry wireless platform. The event took place at Toronto's Windsor Arms Hotel. Allan Silber - Chair, along with Richard Venn of UJA Federation Campaign 2004 - was on hand to address the crowd about the upcoming Campaign. Israel the focus of campaign preview

UJA Federation's advance look at Campaign 2004 for its most prominent campaigners may have taken place in north Toronto, but Israel was clearly the centre of attention.

The event was UJA Federation's Leadership Launch at which the organization's key leaders get to know both each other and campaign basics before the fundraising drive officially begins.

Campaign 2004, a special campaign, chaired by Allan Silber and Richard Venn, will be raising funds to strengthen Israel's deteriorating social service network, help combat a rising tide of anti-Israel hatred and provide a new Jewish generation with the tools to defend Israel and the Jewish people.

Mark Talisman was the keynote speaker at UJA Federation's recent Leadership Launch.

"While Israel is not in the midst of the same emergency as last year, the crisis in Israel has worsened," said Venn, noting surging security expenses, dramatically decreased Israeli government funding for social services, rising welfare caseloads and increasing unemployment.

Guest speaker Mark Talisman, a leading Jewish organizational consultant, echoed Venn's assessment. "This is a continuous crisis that is going to get a lot worse before it gets better," he said. "There is no economy in Israel. It doesn't exist because Israel is on a war footing."

Talisman also expressed concern about the disturbing aspects of Israeli life today that we don't necessarily see – hunger, poverty and unemployment. "There is no process to allow the social side of the budget to be funded," he noted. "Every dime that we give allows programs to operate that benefit real, live human beings."

The Leadership Launch coincided with Yom Hazikaron, the day on which Israel and the Jewish world remember victims of terror and the many thousands who have died in Israel's defense. Allan Silber, who, with his wife Hinda hosted the event, observed that Yom Hazikaron is the perfect time to remember the troubling world facing Israel and Jews everywhere and how UJA Federation Campaign 2004 offers an action plan to deal with it.

New award honours Toronto philanthropist

Harold Lederman, who passed away in 2001 at the age of 69, was the personification of philanthropy.

Now, in recognition of Lederman's selfless efforts over the years, the UJA Federation Past Campaign Chairs Council has created the Harold Lederman Award, in honour of individuals who, like Harold, have demonstrated outstanding philanthropy.

"Harold and I were business partners and great friends since 1955 and remained so until the day he died," says Past UJA Campaign Chair Leo Goldhar. "He was such a good person – not only in terms of business, but when it came to philanthropy. He was always there when someone needed help, and not only in the Jewish community, but the community-at-large."

The idea of honouring his good friend came to Goldhar 18 months ago.

"I wanted some type of award for people who have the same passion for philanthropy that Harold had. That's what this award is all about," he says.

A tireless UJA Federation volunteer, Harold embodied the qualities necessary to make a difference. As chair of UJA Federation's 1988 annual campaign, no job was too big or too small when it came to tzedakah. He continued to take on challenging volunteer roles each and every year, such as canvassing or chairing UJA Israel solidarity missions, and other key committees. He was also Chairman of the Board of the Baycrest Foundation, and a board member of the Princess Margaret Hospital Foundation.

"Harold was driven by a keen social conscience of what was right and what was wrong," says his brother-in-law, Gerry Ross. "Continuity was important to him. He taught his children and grandchildren that one should give as one lives and support their community."

Harold Lederman

"Harold was a very warm, bright and articulate person with a quick wit," says son-in-law Allan Brown. "He had so many friends. And when you were his friend, you were his friend for life."

"Harold's message was to be responsible. He led by example, not by rhetoric. We all miss his presence, his warmth and, above all, his leadership," adds Ross.

The award will be presented to an individual who has demonstrated an exceptionally high level or quality contribution, which significantly impacted on the community, and long-standing devoted service to the community.

Nominations should include the following (where applicable), with specific examples: description of time and effort; evidence of the impact of gift support; evidence of innovation; evidence of leadership qualities; evidence of success in a particular area exemplifying excellence, and evidence of creativity.

This year's Harold Lederman Award will be presented at a special event in the Fall. For an application form, or for more information, call Ronit Holtzman at 416.631.5738 or via email at rholtzman@ujafed.org

Toronto Celebrates Yom Ha'atzmaut

An estimated 5,000 members of Toronto's Jewish community came out last week to show their support for Israel, while also celebrating the State's 55th anniversary.

Organized by UJA Federation of Greater Toronto and the Israel Now Consortium of 115 organizations supporting Israel, the second annual Yom Ha'atzmaut march began at the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre, proceeding south on Bathurst to Earl Bales Park where old and young alike celebrated Israel's birthday by singing, dancing, enjoying special activities for children, and eating kosher Israeli foods.

"What a tremendous testament this march was to Toronto's incredible Jewish community," said Julia Koschitzky, Chair, Israel Now Consortium. "Despite the inclement weather, the community was more determined than ever to stand proudly with Israel. I was especially thrilled to see so many young people on hand, as well as the entire cross-section of our Jewish community. This was largely due to the tremendous efforts of the chairs of this year's celebration: David and Felicia Posluns, Mark and Robyn Shiner, and Ray Rubin and Lloyd Hoffman. I was already on the phone to Israel the next morning. They know what we're doing in Toronto, and it means so much to them."

JF&CS executive director to retire this summer

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Gordon Wolfe's career at Jewish Family and Child Service (JF&CS) dates back to an era of hippies, drugs and "Don't trust anyone over 30," a catch-phrase used by young baby boomers in the 1960s.

At the time, Wolfe was just the wrong side of 30, but his first responsibilities at JF&CS included setting up and running the Yorkville trailer, a mobile office dedicated to street youth.

Now the lifelong Torontonian, a second-generation Canadian, is preparing for his upcoming retirement, when Ron Levine of Edmonton takes his place in mid-summer.

"There's still some ambivalence, [but] I think the timing is right," Wolfe said of his decision. "The place is in good shape, and I'm in good shape."

Wolfe, who turns 67 next month, said he'll miss the action, the people and the challenges. He's hoping to take on short-term projects like running agencies that are in trouble or that suddenly find themselves without a director, as he has on occasion in the past.

"I want to work," said the father of three and grandfather of 8-year-old triplets. "I don't have a lot of hobbies. I don't play golf. I'm not even a big traveller, so I want to stay involved in the community, both the Jewish community and beyond."

Wolfe has an affinity for youth work dating back to his student days as a youth program supervisor at Holy Blossom Temple, where he celebrated his bar mitzvah and is now a board member and former president (as he is at Mazon Canada).

"I like the people piece, providing leadership and supervising people and working with people," Wolfe said.

Although he started a university program in commerce and finance, he quickly concluded it wasn't for him. After completing his BA at the University of Toronto in 1959, he continued on for his master of social work degree.

Many of his friends chose careers that were more lucrative, he recalls. "But I've never regretted that decision."

After graduating in 1961, he began his career as director of youth activities at Holy Blossom, a ten-month-a-year job that allowed him to pursue his passion for summer camp. "I still refer to that as my first love," he said.

In fact, all his summers until 1981, when he returned to JF&CS as executive director after a seven-year stint in the same position at Huntley Youth Services, were spent at summer camps, including 10 years as co-owner of Camp Wabikon with his wife Linda, the preschool co-ordinator at Bialik Hebrew Day School.

Proceeds from a tribute dinner being held in Wolfe's honour on May 21 at Beth Tzedec Congregation will be used to send kids to camp as well as to provide other extracurricular activities and assist former crown wards as they enter adulthood, through the Gordon Wolfe Children & Youth Fund.

Gordon Wolfe

In 1967, Wolfe left Holy Blossom for JF&CS after being hired by then executive director Jerome Diamond. As supervisor of detached youth services, a "fancy title" that referred to his out-of-office field work, he addressed Jewish communal concerns about hippies, drugs and kids on the street.

Wolfe decided the way to approach the issue was to "hang out on Yorkville [Avenue]," then a haven for hippies including Jewish youth and American draft-dodgers.

"The idea of a trailer was born," said Wolfe, who hired workers in their 20s – to whom the Yorkville crowd could relate – to work from late afternoon into the early morning hours. The innovative program serving Jewish and non-Jewish youth used the trailer if private conversations or medical help was needed, but staff were expected to be out on the street.

In his straightforward, pragmatic way, Wolfe noted that young people "weren't going to come to 150 Beverley Street."

Within a few years the agency opened a second office at Lawrence Plaza, following the Jewish community northward. Wolfe supervised its staff of seven. By 1981, the agency was housed completely in that two-floor office, but today it has grown to 100 staff in three offices.

Over the years Wolfe has seen an increase in the array of JF&CS' services in response to issues related to rising divorce rates and dual-career families. As the children's aid society for the Jewish community since 1980, the agency has also become more "child welfare focused," he said, noting progress in recognizing, reporting and dealing with child abuse as an example.

The Jewish aspect is also significant, said Wolfe. "We think kids need to be brought up Jewishly in Jewish foster homes, provided with Jewish content, and have the opportunity to celebrate holidays." Also, he added, even secular Jewish clients speak of their comfort level dealing with a Jewish agency and with staff who "understand what it means to be Jewish."

"We also do a lot more in the area of camping," Wolfe pointed out. "We send a lot more kids to camp. That has to do with my past and my belief that camp is so important for kids in the summer."

These days, he added, there is more accountability to government and the United Way, both of which fund JF&CS. "It's not enough [any more] to say we carried out 2,000 interviews. Did anybody get better?" Although results are not easily measurable in the social work field, Wolfe believes the change is a good one.

"Providing quality services with diminishing resources" has been his biggest challenge over the years, he said. Among the solutions were the introduction of telephone counselling and training staff in short-term, solution-focused therapy techniques.

"One other piece I'm proud of," said the one-time would-be accountant. "We always balanced the budget."

Yeshiva students spend part of Passover in FSU

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

When Yitzi Spalter and 11 other yeshiva students from the Toronto area returned from the former Soviet Union where they spent part of Passover, they said they came away with a new outlook on life.

The boys were part of a group of 300 from North America and Israel who visited about 257 out of the 407 communities – 150 have permanent Chabad representatives – across the FSU on behalf of the Federation of Jewish Communities, which works in partnership with the Chabad movement.

The purpose of their visit, said Rabbi Moshe Spalter, administrator of Chabad Lubavitch of Southern Ontario, was to plan and run the two Passover seders.

"They arrived at their city a few days before Passover, looked for a place to hold the seder, arranged for the food, found a cook and drummed up business."

The federation had arranged for two million pounds of matzah and 250,000 bottles of wine to be sent to the various communities, he said. "The logistics are staggering."

The boys did an incredible job, Rabbi Spalter said. "As well as running the seders, they gave talks on Shabbat, ran pre-Passover workshops, and spoke at gatherings in honour of the Rebbe's birthday."

They had been previously trained in how to kosher a kitchen and how to deal with the difficulties of running a seder in Russia.

"Many of the boys were in Siberia where nightfall is at 11 p.m. Their rabbis had taught them which part of the seder could be done before nightfall so the seder would not go on all night," he said.

But, they also took something away with them. "One boy remarked that he went to a marketplace to shop and saw a man selling two onions and a bunch of scallions. That was the total of his wares.

"Another man was selling two iron rods. The boy said that suddenly he came face to face with what he has at home."

Residents of the various communities were overwhelmed with their visitors, Rabbi Spalter said.

"Passover touches a chord with people in Russia. They remember when they used to celebrate the holiday, and bake matzah. Younger families were thrilled that their children were learning Hebrew songs."

He said that one man was proud to show one of the boys his mezuzah, and the boy realized it was just a case. "He is arranging to send him the klaf."

What made their boys' visit special, said Rabbi Spalter, is that most of them lived away from home for most of the year, and could have had a 10 day holiday with their families.

"Instead they chose to help out where they could. We are all proud of them."

Warsaw survivor posed as Polish farmhand

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

When he was a youngster attending public school in prewar Warsaw, Natan Janower and the other Jewish students had to leave the room while their Catholic classmates recited Christian prayers. Standing in the hallway, he could clearly hear their fervent prayers recited in unison, praising the father, the son and the holy spirit.

Years later, it was his memory of that prayer – and his ability to recite it flawlessly while making the sign of the cross – that saved his life while trying to avoid arrest in the Polish countryside.

"I am sitting here because of that," Janower says today.

Through a fortuitous turn of events, Janower was able to escape the Warsaw Ghetto prior to the April 1943 uprising and wander the Polish countryside, taking short-term jobs as a farmhand. His survival depended on his ability to outwit Polish auxiliary police, who, working with the Nazis, were charged with hunting down Jews. On more than one occasion, he was stopped and accused of being Jewish and that's when, to prove his Polish credentials, he recited the prayer he had heard in school. Hearing his perfect rendition of the prayer, many of his Polish interrogators were satisfied. On another occasion, a more skeptical pair of police refused to believe him and Janower had to fight both of them, stripping one of his gun and chasing them off.

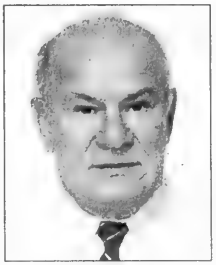
Janower was born on Novolipia Street in Warsaw, a street that would later become part of the ghetto. But when he was quite young, around three, his family moved to Leszno Street in a Christian area of the city.

As he tells it, his father, Yosel, was a tailor who was barely able to make a living. Competition from other tailors in the Jewish quarter was fierce, so to better his prospects, he moved the family to another area of town.



Natan Janower

Despite the move, the family remained poor. Sometimes the family of four children skipped meals when there was no money for food. Things were so bad that when the weather turned particularly nasty in the winter, Natan would miss school because he and his brother, Shlomo, had to share one pair of shoes. On warmer, drier days, he'd slip on a pair of cardboard shoes and go to school, but unlike his classmates, he would do without lunch.

At first his Orthodox father sent him to cheder, but he never liked it and was eventually transferred into public school. There, the Gentile kids teased and tormented him, pulling on his payot (sidelocks) and beating him up. His mother, Sura, told him to stand up for himself and one day he fought back. To his surprise, he turned the tables on the Gentile kids, beating them up. From then on, they let him alone.

In September 1939, when the Nazis attacked Poland, Janower answered a call to join a Warsaw militia unit. He was given a uniform and put to work digging anti-tank trenches. During an artillery bombardment by German forces, his trench was struck and all the other diggers were killed. Janower was badly wounded by shrapnel and his entire left side was paralyzed. He spent months recuperating – at first in a Gentile hospital and later in the Czysta Hospital – and he still carries a piece of shrapnel in his leg that sets off airport alarms.

When the ghetto was established, his family was forced to move to incredibly cramped quarters on Wolynski Street. The six shared a kitchen that was part of a two-bedroom apartment while eight others shared the rest of the apartment. There was no running water, no electricity and washrooms were outside the apartment.

There were also no jobs for his father. Food was scarce and conditions were appalling. What's more, Germans took delight in humiliating Jews.

Janower recalls an incident that occurred to his father, a Chassidic Jew with a long beard and payot. "One day, my father came home. He was crying and wanted to commit suicide. The Germans had cut his beard, but my mother told him not to commit suicide."

In the ghetto's early days, Janower was able to don his Polish uniform and come and go from the ghetto at will, visiting his father's old clients and collecting money they still owed. With those funds, he bought potatoes, bread and lentils, the basics needed for survival. When security tightened up, he was able to exit the ghetto through a secret hole in the brick ghetto wall.

He also joined work details that left the ghetto to do a variety of jobs, like cleaning German barracks, removing bomb debris and – his best job – cleaning German kitchens. That allowed him to steal some food and bring it back home.

One day in 1942, he saw returning workers being beaten if they were carrying food. He turned around and decided he would not take a chance entering the ghetto, figuring he might never be allowed to exit.

He spent the following nights hiding out in washrooms and during the day, he mingled with Jews leaving the ghetto on work details.

He never returned to the ghetto after that.

Fearing capture in Warsaw, Janower headed to the countryside. It was during that period that he had his encounter with Polish auxiliary police.

Janower lived from day to day, working at farms and keeping on the move. One day, Polish auxiliaries arrested him and brought him to the mayor of the local town, Mroczky. The mayor's son had returned from forced labour in Germany and refused to return. Facing demands from the Germans that his son return, the mayor gave Janower a choice. Either he could go work on a German farm as a substitute for his son, pretending to be his brother, or he could be returned to the ghetto.

Though afraid to go into "the lion's den," he chose that option and was sent to a farm in Valtersdorf, a village near Konigsberg. It was while working there in the summer of 1944 – using the Polish name Stanislaus – that he learned of the fate of the Warsaw Ghetto.

One day a young SS man walked towards the barn where he was working. He was striding purposely and tapping his boots with a leather baton. Janower thought his days were numbered. Shaking and in a cold sweat, he said nothing as the officer told him to prepare a horse for him to ride to his girlfriend.

When he had done so and brought him the horse, he overheard the SS man speaking to his father, the farm-owner. "He told his father while I held the horse of the Warsaw Ghetto. He said the Jews were like worms, that in Warsaw the Jews wanted to fight the army and they were destroyed and there were no more Jews in Warsaw."

It was the first he had heard of the rebellion. "Then I start to know that my family was gone," he said.

At war's end, Janower retuned to Poland and learned that the mayor's son, whose place he had taken, had been killed while fighting the Germans.

"He wanted to save his son and he saved me," Janower said.

Janower remained in Poland after the war. He was able to upgrade his education and worked for 25 years as a designer of radio amplifiers in the Diora factory in Dzierzoniuw. In 1970, as anti-Semitism spiked following Israel's victory in the 1967 Six-Day War, he emigrated with his wife and four children to Toronto where he got a job with a large firm working on printed circuit boards.

In Toronto he integrated into the Jewish community, joining Jewish organizations and contributing to fundraising campaigns for various agencies.

Now retired, Janower has recorded his experiences on videotape for future generations. Even today, he shakes his head when he recalls how he avoided death. "It's unbelievable stories," he says simply.

Shalom Village is building the future of long term care...today

Help open the doors with your contribution to our $13.5 million capital campaign.

The thought of placing a loved one in a long term care facility is for many a difficult decision often tinged with worry, regret and a sense of defeat and helplessness. Families who have chosen Shalom Village know that this does not have to be the case. Shalom Village is a long term care organization in Hamilton, Ontario, serving seniors since 1981. We are about people, ideas, higher standards, building on the strengths of our residents and making a difference in their lives. We are about being a real home where you want to go not where you have to go. Shalom Village is about moving, not sacrificing.

We are currently expanding our ability to respond to requests to move home to Shalom Village with a beautiful new addition. Scheduled to open in January of 2004 Shalom Village Too will allow us to care for 124 people needing long term care and raise our total of supported housing apartments to 83. We are extremely gratified that to date over $11.0 million has been raised for this project.

At Shalom Village we are all about looking at things differently. We have a unique in-house fitness club, we have a Bistro where we serve beautiful kosher meals so our residents can go out to dinner, once again sitting at the head of their table with family and friends. Our Shul brings our community and residents together in a familiar and accessible setting.

Your donation will help us continue in our groundbreaking efforts to ensure that long term care truly becomes a change of address - a resource we can all depend upon and freely choose if the need should arise. For more information we invite you to visit us on our web site at www.shalomvillage.on.ca or call 905 528-5377.

A message from Eugene Levy,

Dear friends, in my life I have been blessed. I have been able to take a knack for making people laugh and turn it into a life of fulfillment and success. More importantly I have been blessed with a beautiful family and good friends. They are, what is most dear to me.

Even though I no longer live in Hamilton, my roots and my memories are deep. I still have a soft spot for my hometown. When I was approached to act as Honourary Chair of the Shalom Village Too Capital Campaign, I realized that this was a way to show my thanks to an organization that has made a tremendous difference in the care of those close to me and to the care and well being of our elderly community.

In a way, Shalom Village is a miracle. It's not as big or as rich as some other long term care facilities. However it has quietly gone about creating a name for itself as one of the best long term care centres in Canada and beyond. It has done this with an unwavering passion to provide the best home environment possible for people to live in.

The current physical expansion at Shalom Village is in response to a heartfelt need for increased programs and services for our aging parents. These are programs and services that will build on the strong foundation of an organization whose mission is to honour our fathers and our mothers.

Shalom Village is a community that's been built on ideas. These ideas have captured the imagination of hundreds of volunteers, donors and benefactors. I am asking you to respond generously because it is deserving of our energy, our time and our donations.

Thank you

Ceremony marks Yom Hazikaron, Yom Ha'atzmaut

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

The sombreness of Yom Hazikaron – the memorial day for those who have died in defence of the state of Israel – gives way immediately to an exuberant celebration of Yom Ha'atzmaut, Israel's independence day, dramatically illustrating "the ultimate dichotomy" of the Jewish experience.

"In a second, the focus shifts. There is no time to catch your breath," event co-chair Gav Martell told a standing-room-only crowd at Shaarei Shomayim Congregation last week at the annual ceremony marking Yom Hazikaron and Yom Ha'atzmaut sponsored by the Mizrachi Organization of Canada, Emunah Women, Yavneh, and Bnei Akiva.

Using a theme echoed throughout the evening, which was co-chaired by Shloime Romberg, Martell said the gift God gave the Jewish people, the gift of a state, was given at a cost – "the lives of our soldiers, civilians and kids."

Israel's outgoing consul-general in Toronto, Meir Romem, said that despite the violence and the downturn in the economy because of the latest Palestinian intifadah, Israel "remains strong, and committed to peace."

Jews have the obligation to do what they can to assist Israel, so that "those who died did not do so in vain," he said.

He and Miriam Goldstein, a family friend, remembered Daniel Mandel, whose family made aliyah from Toronto, and who was killed last month during a military operation. His grandmother, Gerry Males, was in the audience.

Local members of Bnei Akiva decided to do so in memory of Israeli victims of terror.

In an emotional explanation, Bnei Akiva members Shira Sokol and Sabrina Grodzinsky said studying the Mishnah so was in accord with religious Zionist philosophy to combine prayer and hope with action. Each chapter was devoted to the soul of a particular victim.

Perhaps the most poignant part of the Yom Hazikaron program was a speech by Rabbi Shlomo Gemara, rosh yeshiva of Yeshivat Or Chaim and Ulpanat Orot girls school, who served in the Israel Defence Forces.

Rabbi Gemara said that on Yom Hazikaron, he remembers his fallen comrades – those he studied with, those he served with, those he was friends with. He recalled his friend Yehuda Katz, a soldier who has been considered missing in action since being captured in Lebanon in 1982. "When he comes back, we will resume learning Torah at the same point as we left off."

Later, a moment of silence was punctuated by the eerie scream of an air raid siren.

Just as total darkness fell, and the day of mourning turned into the day of joy, the moment was marked by a recorded excerpt of David Ben-Gurion's declaration of the establishment of the state.

The mood then changed abruptly, as a group of young Bnei Akiva girls performed the daglanut, a stylized presentation with Israeli flags. Their performance was greeted with whoops, hollering and cheers, as was a concert by the Netivot Hatorah Day School choir.

David Bernstein led a special Yom Ha'atzmaut service, which included a prayer for the state, as well as Ani Ma'amin, a plea for the coming of the messiah.

The program was followed by a lively reception, including dancing to the music of the Shirayim band.

Also taking part in the evening were Rabbi Avichai Zahavi, a shaliach at the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto, and Elka Yarlowe, the new executive director of Emunah Women, who lit a candle for the dead.

Toronto turns out to celebrate Israel's birthday

"You wouldn't believe the kinds of things – dry goods, deli items, soft drinks," he said

If every Jewish family in Toronto used 20 per cent of its weekly grocery budget for Israeli products, Fox said, we could send an extra $150 million to Israel annually.

He was also raising awareness for the Buy Israeli Web site, accessible through UJA's Jewish Toronto site. "The best way to help the country," he said, "is to keep Israelis employed."

About 10 people at the entrance to Earl Bales Park held signs protesting Israeli "occupation." Several Jews for Jesus missionaries also circulated among the crowd, handing out reading materials promoting Christianity. Many Jews responded emotionally to their presence, but even this couldn't overshadow the crowd's excitement, as children and adults paraded, singing traditional songs and an impromptu round of Happy Birthday.

"All those who couldn't make it because the weather was less than ideal... missed out on a wonderful collective outpouring of spirit and a feeling of the community coalescing for the cause of Israel," Fine said. "It was a bit chilly, but the spirit in the crowd... walking, singing and dancing... more than made up for it."

Thousands turned out to show their support for Israel.

Six thousand voices strong, the message came through loud and clear: 55 is a great start, and with our support, Israel will be around for many happy returns.

CELEBRATING YOM HA'ATZMAUT

Almost 400 people gathered last week at the City Playhouse in Thornhill to celebrate Israel's 55th Independence Day, Yom Ha'atzmaut, at a gala evening organized by the Israeli Association of Greater Toronto, an affiliate of UJA Federation. Attendees admired the work of members of the Israeli Artists Group of Toronto at a reception preceding the screening of an Israeli film dramatization of an Israeli family's brush with terrorism. The evening ended on a more festive note with performances by an Israeli folk dance troupe and four young singers bringing a message of hope.

Festive evening honours Jewish students

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Hillel of Greater Toronto's eighth annual awards night was held recently on the Ryerson University campus, a particularly appropriate venue, according to Larry Sonenberg, president of the local Jewish campus umbrella.

Speaking at the festive event, Sonenberg said the locale recognized Ryerson as an integral part of Hillel, as well as acknowledging Ryerson Hillel's Student Group of the Year award by the campus' own student administrative council. The school and its Hillel are less well known than their more prominent local counterparts at York University and the University of Toronto.

Recapping highlights of the year, Sonenberg noted that Hillel of Greater Toronto (formerly Jewish Campus Services of Greater Toronto) adopted its new name in January, formalizing its relationship with the international Jewish student organization.

Local programs include an annual arts festival, pub nights, Shabbat dinners and sandwich-making for the homeless, but the organization's "area of greatest challenge," said Sonenberg, is Israel advocacy.

"This has not been the easiest of years for Jewish students on campus," said Zac Kaye, Hillel Toronto's executive director since its inception eight years ago. "Confrontation and mistrust have been the order of the day, particularly between Jewish and Muslim students."

Anti-Israel sentiment on campus has created "a distinct anti-Semitic tone," said Kaye. "On some of our campuses, it has created an atmosphere of intimidation and fear. We believe in and support unequivocally the State of Israel... Hillel calls on administrators to ensure that the playing field remains level and that all members of the campus community can express their views with mutual respect and tolerance."

Among the challenges faced on Canadian campuses this year were the riots at Concordia University last September over former Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's visit, resulting in the cancellation of his appearance; as well as the brouhaha over Middle East analyst Daniel Pipes' appearance at York, which was initially cancelled but eventually allowed to go ahead under heavy security.

"There is much to celebrate tonight," said Kaye. "We have managed to do some wonderful and creative programming."

In addition, he said, the Wolfond Centre for Jewish Campus Life – the long-awaited Hillel headquarters just off the University of Toronto campus – is expected to open in the fall and will include an advocacy centre, said Kaye. It is the first "purpose-built" Hillel centre designed and built from the ground up.

Kaye also cited leadership programs for Toronto students, some of which are based in Israel.

Honoree Jack Chisvin, who received a Founding Friend of the Campus award, paid tribute to the role Hillel played in his life, connecting him with Phyllis, his wife of almost 50 years.

The former federation president, who has taken an active role in the Wolfond Centre project (Kaye said he is referred to as "project manager"), remembers when Jewish students were marginalized and subject to quotas at Canadian campuses. The advent of Hillel in the late 1940s played a major role in raising Jewish pride, Chisvin said.

Hillel breeds leaders, he noted, recalling some of his fellow students at the University of Manitoba who went on to prominent community positions.

Hadracha (leadership) awards were presented to Seth Winberg, Adam Cutler, Daniel Steinberg, Joanna Szweras, Matt Rossner, Viktor Vitebski, Victor Volfson and Elysse Zarek.

Students receiving awards for contributions to Jewish life on their individual campuses were Ronit Kantarzhi, Ayallah Greenberg, Eyal Lewin, Almog Avisror and Holly Shulman (Ryerson); Yaniv Tzafir, Johanna Herman, Dave Horowitz, Ilene Harris and Lauren Parl (U of T); and Yaakov Roth, Jonathan Avery, Aliza Libman and Dori Borshiov (York).

Roth co-edited Gam Yachad, a student-written literary journal, in response to the crisis in Israel, with student Jason Rotstein and his sister Dalia Rotstein. The publication was launched at the event.

Citywide award winners were Eric Stutz (Schwartz Family Award for Tzedek and Social Justice); Denes Rothschild (Lapowich Family Award for Israel Advocacy on Campus); Shoshie Lockshin (Sidney Mendick Memorial Award for Building Pluralism and Diversity); Daniel Held (Nechama and Ya'akov Kainer Award for Creative Programming); Shira Zeliger (Canadian Jewish News Award for Communication); Andrew Ash, Noam Guberman and Paul Cooper (Paisley Manor Insurance Brokers Inc. Award for Special Involvement in Jewish Campus Life); Michael Garfinkle (Jacobovici Family Award for Arts and Culture); Michael Ferman (Gropper Family Award for Outstanding Leadership); Sari Gilboa (Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto Action Committee Award for Enhancing Jewish Identity and Continuity); and Jordie Saperia (Hillel of Greater Toronto Award for Ongoing Commitment to Jewish Student Life).

The Hebrew University of Jerusalem remains a place where 23,000 students from 70 different countries and all religious backgrounds study together in peace. Scholars and scientists from around the world come to the Hebrew University to collaborate.

The Israel government's need to divert funding to defense is exacting a costly toll in budget cuts to the University.

A Taste of Turkish Cuisine

BY NORENE GILLETZ
Special to The CJN

Sheilah Kaufman, cooking teacher and author of 24 cookbooks, gave a fascinating cooking demonstration on Turkish cuisine at the Montreal Jewish Public Library last month. Nearly 100 people attended and were led on a delightful culinary adventure.

Kaufman explained that traditional Turkish cuisine focuses on beans, grains, fresh fruits, vegetables and of course, yogurt, one of Turkey's most important contributions to international cuisine. She co-authored A Taste of Turkish Cuisine ($24.95 US, Hippocrene) with Nur Ilkin, wife of the former ambassador of Turkey to the United States, who learned the secrets of Turkish cooking from her grandmother.

Kaufman demonstrated two delicious Turkish recipes – individual meat-filled boerek and a delectable rose-shaped baklava. The baklava was first prepared in 1973 for Queen Elizabeth II and served to her at Topkapi Palace. Her Majesty loved it and so will you!

Kaufman also demonstrated a delicious garlic dip from her book Simply Irresistible that will make a garlic lover out of anyone. Enjoy!

YOU'VE NEVER TASTED ANYTHING LIKE THIS GARLIC DIP

4 large cloves garlic, peeled whole bunch of fresh parsley, with long stems removed 6 oz. can smoked almonds
2 cups regular or low-fat mayonnaise

In a food processor, carefully grind the garlic, parsley and almonds until finely chopped. Do not let the garlic turn to liquid. Place in a bowl and fold in mayonnaise. Blend well. Cover and refrigerate. Stir well before serving. Serve with fresh vegetables, crackers, bread, chips or whatever strikes your fancy.

This can be spread on grilled fish or chicken, or a potato and pop it into the broiler until the dip gets bubbly.

Makes about 1½ cups. Serves 8 or more. Can be prepared a few days ahead of time.

Hint: When fresh garlic and fresh parsley are chopped together, a chemical reaction takes place and the eater will not get garlic breath, or garlic upset!

TALASH BOEREK
Meat Wrapped in Puff Pastry

This easy, elegant dish can be used as a main course for entertaining or for family. Nur also fills these with chicken or other favourite fillings instead of meat.

2 tbsp. margarine
1 tbsp. vegetable oil
1 medium onion, finely chopped
1 lb. stew beef, cut into ½-inch cubes
2 cubanel peppers, seeded and sliced crosswise
1 large tomato, peeled and diced
2 tsp. tomato paste
salt and freshly ground pepper
½ tsp. dried oregano
2 cups warm water
1 sheet frozen puff pastry, thawed
1 egg (for glazing)

Heat oil in a pot. Saute the onions for 5 minutes, add the meat, mix well and cook over medium heat for 3 minutes to sear in juices of meat. Add peppers, tomato, tomato paste, salt and pepper to taste, oregano and warm water. Bring to a boil, cover, reduce heat to medium and cook for an hour. You should have a thick sauce with meat and no juices.

Depending on your stove, if you still have a lot of liquid left after 45 minutes, remove the lid, and cook, stirring, until all the liquid has been absorbed. Or you can drain any remaining liquid off and save it for a soup or sauce.

Preheat oven to 350. On a lightly floured surface, roll out puff pastry until it is approximately 15 in. square. Cut pastry into 4 equal squares. Turn the squares so a point is facing you and squares now look like diamonds. Divide meat filling among pastry pieces. Bring the point nearest you up and over the meat. Bring the side points across the meat and the top point down, making an envelope over the meat. Turn the envelopes over and place on a cookie sheet.

Brush tops of envelopes with egg. Bake for 25 to 35 minutes, or until golden brown. Serve at once. Serves 4.

ORANGE BAKLAVA À LA KAZAN

Syrup:
3 cups sugar
juice of 1 or 2 lemons

Baklava:
4 large oranges
2½ to 3 cups sugar
1 lb. phyllo dough, thawed, room temperature
1 lb. unsalted butter, clarified (below)
garnish (optional): whipped cream and mint leaves

Syrup: Place sugar and 2 cups of water in a saucepan and bring to a boil, stirring until sugar is dissolved. Reduce heat to medium and cook syrup uncovered 10 to 15 minutes.

Stir in lemon juice; mix well. Cook another minute or two. Remove from heat, let cool, then refrigerate.

Using a small sharp knife, slice peel from tops and bottom of oranges, then slice orange peel in 6 pieces (from top to bottom), leaving each orange intact. Place peel in a large pot with cold water to cover; bring to a boil. Reduce heat and cook for 15 minutes.

Drain in a colander; place peel in a bowl of cold water until cool. This helps remove any bitterness from peel. Drain well, pressing with a clean kitchen towel to get rid of excess water. Chop the peel in a food processor.

Slice oranges into ½-in. slices; cut again into ½-in. pieces. Place in a large bowl with sugar and chopped peel.

Mix well and let mixture sit for an hour so oranges will absorb some of the sugar. Place orange-sugar mixture in a pot and cook 15 to 20 minutes on low heat, stirring constantly.

Remove from heat and let cool. If there is a large amount of liquid, drain it and discard. Consistency should be like a paste. Can be made ahead in large batches and stored in the refrigerator.

Place a sheet of phyllo on a work surface, covering remaining phyllo with a very slightly dampened towel to keep it from drying out. Brush sheet lightly with melted butter and fold in half to form a sheet about 13 x 8 inches.

Turn phyllo so long edge is facing you and spread about a teaspoon of filling across the top, about 1½ in. from the edge. Brush phyllo below the row of filling lightly with melted butter, bring the long edge over the filling. Continue to roll phyllo up like a log or jelly roll. Carefully begin to coil one end of the log, continuing until you have a "rose." Place on a lightly greased jelly roll pan and brush with a little melted butter. Repeat, making and coiling the remaining baklavas.

Preheat oven to 375. Bake baklava for 15 to 25 minutes, until lightly browned. Check to make sure bottoms are lightly browned also. Remove from oven and carefully pour chilled syrup over each rose. Serve with whipped cream topped with a mint leaf on top. Makes 24.

Note: Either the syrup must be cold and the baklava warm or hot, or the baklava must be cold and the syrup hot. If both are the same temperature, the dessert will get mushy.

Clarified Butter: Melt butter over very low heat until a foam appears on the surface. Do not burn. Skim off foamy top. Pour clarified butter into a bowl; discard milk solids that gather at bottom of pan. Refrigerate until ready to use.

in a 3-part series about the first Kings of Israel.

king or King: The history of our Monarchy

In every blessing we say, "we acknowledge God as our King".
Yet sparked by a desire to be like everyone else, ancient Israel demanded a change.
We insisted on having a human king to lead us and not the Divine King.
From Saul through to David and Solomon we are challenged by this historic desire.
How do we view these royal monarchs and what can they tell us about Jewish leadership?

Hamilton federation fundraising up 14%

By PHYLLIS SHRAGGE
Hamilton Correspondent

HAMILTON — UJA Federation of Hamilton's fundraising campaign has reached $1 million in pledges, which represents an increase of $112,000, or 14 percent, over last year's campaign.

The $1 million mark has been reached only once before, in 1982, says UJA Federation president Dr. Bonnie Loewith.

Loewith attributed the success of the campaign largely to the hard work of its co-chairs, Dr. Lester Krames and Dr. Paul Roth, and women's division co-chairs, Lanie Goldberg and Beth Bandler, as well as to the efforts of the many volunteers who canvassed donors.

This current milestone was reached in a campaign designed to encourage donors to increase their pledges over the previous year, Loewith said in a telephone interview.

Another reason for the campaign's success was the instigation of professional training for canvassers provided by Jonathan Miller, canvasser trainer. The volunteers were taught the skills necessary to encourage donors to break from the pattern of flat giving.

UJA Hamilton made the commitment to reach out to new donors, as well as those who had made pledges in previous years, Loewith said at the recent annual general meeting.

"Running a successful fundraising campaign is not only a matter of having committed volunteers who are willing to make phone calls and visits. A successful fundraising campaign is a reflection of an agency where the donors trust that their donations are being used responsibly and in a way that will benefit our local community as well as the global Jewish community."

Funds raised by the campaign are directed locally to such institutions as the Hamilton Hebrew Academy, Kehila Jewish Community Day School, Beth Jacob Hebrew School, Temple Anshe Sholom Hebrew School, Midrasha High School, McMaster University Jewish Students Association as well as Jewish Social Services, the Kosher Food Bank, and the Jewish Community Centre. Funds are also allocated to UIA Canada, to institutions in Israel and to Jews in crisis worldwide.

UJA Federation also raised $500,000 locally in its Israel Emergency Campaign designed to help alleviate the economic crisis is Israel brought on by the ongoing Arab violence.

Loewith attributed much of the success of the Israel Emergency Campaign to its leader, Rabbi Mordechai Green, rabbi emeritus of Adas Israel Synagogue.

The Legacy Endowment Fund, established about five years ago, is being revitalized. UJA Federation board of directors has approved a new set of endowment fund by-laws, opening the way for the recruitment of a new endowment board of trustees.

"The endowment fund provides an opportunity for that vanishing generation of entrepreneurs, those who have carried this community for years, to leave a lasting legacy... Successful endowment initiatives now will make a significant difference to the kind of future we will leave to our successors," Loewith said.

UJA Federation of Hamilton has contracted a grant writer who is exploring a number of different avenues into funding from corporate and private foundations.

"I expect to see corporate dollars coming into the community income stream within the next few months," Loewith said.

Loewith emphasized the need to educate people about the role of UJA Federation.

"Their support of Federation is the single most important step they can take to ensure that this community has a brighter future."

Vancouver to Walk for Israel planned for May 25

VANCOUVER — This city's annual Walk with Israel steps out at 9:30 am, Sunday, May 25, from Beth Israel Synagogue.

Attended by more than 2,000 people last year, the four-kilometre walk is expected to attract people from around British Columbia's Lower Mainland.

It will feature music by a band and a children's choir. The first 1,500 participants will receive a complimentary "We Stand With Israel" button and free admission to Vancouver Talmud Torah's spring fair.

Since the intensification of Palestinian violence in September 2000, the Jewish community of Greater Vancouver, like others around the world, has stepped up its support of Israel, hosting a series of town-hall meetings, rallies and a "Shop Israel" event, in which Vancouverites bought more than $82,000 worth of Israeli goods.

The Walk for Israel will run, rain or shine. Call 604-257-5100 for more information.

CBC gives Spector's realism a full airing

According to Reports
By PAUL MICHAELS

Let's get to the heart of the matter. The principal impediment to a resolution of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict and to the Arab-Israeli conflict in general is that the Palestinians and the broader Arab/Muslim world refuse to acknowledge the legitimacy of Jewish sovereignty in the Middle East.

Journalists can complain about the Israeli right, Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon, settlements, and the "occupation," but they miss the point. Israel can compromise all it wants, but until the Arabs recognize its right to exist as a Jewish state, there will be no long-term end to the conflict.

That essential point was made shockingly clear when Michael Enright interviewed Norman Spector, former Canadian ambassador to Israel and the Palestinian Authority, on CBC radio's Sunday Edition on May 4.

The following exchange took place while discussing the U.S.-backed "road map" to Israeli-Palestinian peace in light of Spector's new book, Chronicle Of A War Foretold.

Enright: "You say that:.. 'I've never met a Palestinian who believes that Jews have not stolen Palestinian lands and that morally Israel has a legitimate right to exist as a Jewish state in the Mideast.' Not one? Not ever?"

Spector: "Not a single one. That doesn't mean I haven't met moderates."

Enright: "Uh-huh. But even the moderates believe that Israel should be driven into the sea? Is that it?"

Spector: "No, no, no, no. Moderates I would define as people who are prepared to recognize Israel. They will even say they are prepared to recognize Israel's existence. But they still think that it has no moral claim. I believe that what we have in the Middle East are two peoples, each of whom has aboriginal claims to the land. For each of those peoples that region is their ancestral homeland and the only way to resolve the conflict is, as the United Nations suggested in '47 and as the road map suggests now, two states for two peoples. But I believe that both claims are equally legitimate. I have never met a Palestinian who believes that Jews have a quasi-aboriginal claim and that it's their ancestral homeland, just as it is the ancestral homeland of the Palestinians. The moderates believe that they have to reconcile themselves to Israel's existence – it's too powerful, or it's the price that they're paying for the Holocaust or this sort of thing – but they do not recognize that the Jewish claim to that territory is equal to their claim."

On occasion, notably during his appearances on CBC Newsworld's Counterspin, Spector has drawn attention to this harsh reality. But never before did the CBC provide such an opportunity for Spector to explain himself so completely.

Coincidentally, on the same day as Spector's radio interview, Ethan Bronner's review of a new book, Shattered Dreams, by French TV Middle East correspondent Charles Enderlin on the failed Camp David summit, appeared in the New York Times 'Sunday Book Review. Bronner began by recounting a conversation he himself once had with the late King Hussein of Jordan. Bronner asked the king if he considered Zionism to be legitimate. "Did he accept that there was any historical basis to the Jews' claim to a portion of Palestine as their homeland? [King Hussein] looked at me as if I were from Mars and ducked the question." That from a true moderate, which King Hussein was.

No one could have underscored Norman Spector's own realistic, if depressing, evaluation of the current situation more credibly.

OJC PROGRAM: Bob Bidner, (right), president of the Okanagan Jewish Community, presents Rabbi Yosef Wosk with a commemorative gift from the OJC during a recent community program. Rabbi Wosk's involvement with Simon Fraser University's continuing studies programs led to his founding a series of café discussions, The Philosophers Café. This program has become an integral part of the OJC's continuing education effort.

Concordia Hillel-CSU dispute put on hold

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL – Concordia Hillel's lawsuit against the Concordia Student Union (CSU) for witholding its funding and denouncing it without just cause has been put on hold by Quebec Superior Court judge François Bélanger, who decided the dispute should be dealt with internally by the university.

Bélanger suspended all proceedings in the case until the plaintiffs have "exhausted their recourses" under the university's charter and other regulations, or have been "prevented from doing so such as can be assessed by a judge of our court."

Bélanger cited article 30 of the Concordia University charter, which stipulates that the board of governors has "a superintending and reforming power over all decisions affecting activities held at Concordia University" and has the power to overrule any decision made by an internal group which it "considers detrimental."

Bélanger did not directly address the administration's past assertion that the CSU is an independent legal entity over which it has no control, but he did say the university has "the power to intervene and sanction, if not the union, at least the students who are party to it."

He also noted that students are not likely to have the financial means to enter into a legal battle.

Hillel's lawyer Michael Bergman said his client is considering whether to appeal Bélanger's ruling, but even if it doesn't, the judgment may force the Concordia administration to act.

"The court believes that the board of governors has some authority to deal with the CSU. Historically, the university has insisted it does not possess the power to sanction or overturn the CSU's decisions. The court seems to disagree."

Bergman said the administration has not done all that it can to ensure civil debate on campus and to protect Jewish students from "intimidation." He said the decision gives Hillel the grounds to return to court if things don't get better.

The Hillel-CSU dispute began Dec. 2 when the CSU executive passed a resolution condemning Hillel for having flyers on an information table about Mahal, a program that allows Diaspora Jews to serve in the Israeli army.

The CSU said that amounted to military recruiting on campus, which is against CSU policy and might be illegal under a federal statute against recruitment for foreign armies.

The resolution deprived Hillel of using campus space for tables and postering and withheld its CSU funding, which amounted to $3,000. Hillel claimed it was "effectively banned" from Concordia.

Later in December, the CSU executive restored Hillel's ability to use space but continued the suspension of funds until Hillel apologizes and it and all other CSU-affiliated clubs sign a "statement of principles" committing it to mutual respect, avoidance of racism and no military recruiting. Hillel has refused.

Hillel was demanding $100,000 in punitive damages from the CSU, claiming it violated its own bylaws, the university's charter and Jewish students' constitutional freedoms by withholding Hillel's funding and denouncing it without just cause.The suit alleged that the CSU is deliberately suppressing Hillel because of its pro-Israel stance.

Bergman has also filed for an interlocutory injunction to have the court order the CSU to apologize and unconditionally reinstate Hillel as a member student club before the end of the semester.

Hillel named Concordia as a co-party, alleging that the administration has not exercised the authority it has over student conduct and security.

"The ball is now in Concordia's court," said Frank Schlesinger, legal counsel for Canadian Jewish Congress, which has been granted intervenor status in the case.

"We will call on the administration to do its duty, to pursue all avenues. This was one of Hillel's demands."

The CSU's lawyer Guiseppe Sciortino filed motions dismissing Hillel's injunction request, stating that any charges against the CSU of violating the university's regulations can be heard by the university's own conflict-resolution bodies. He also said the CSU never withdrew recognition of Hillel as an affiliated club.

Aaron Maté, an outgoing 2002-2003 CSU vice-president, said the CSU will not apologize to Hillel until it apologizes for the Mahal flyers and signs the statement of principles, as all 54 other clubs have done. All the CSU may apologize for is for "perhaps not giving Hillel enough notice" and following due process before it tabled the resolution condemning and sanctioning it, he said.

Maté hailed Bélanger's decision, saying it recognizes the difference between criticism of Israeli government policies and anti-Semitism. He accused Hillel and Jewish community leaders of seeking to "silence" people who support Palestinian rights. "I hope students who criticize the Israeli government will not have to worry about being sued by Hillel and its bosses."

Bergman said Bélanger misunderstood the nature of the dispute because of his characterization of it as one between Jewish students who differ on the Middle East conflict.

In his ruling, Bélanger describes the dispute as pitting the pro-Israel Hillel, which represents "a part of the Jewish students," against the CSU, "a majority of whose executive members are equally of the Hebrew faith [sic]… who support the position of the United Nations on this subject."

Even though the case is suspended, Bergman said Hillel is continuing with an appeal of Bélanger's granting of intervenor status to a group called Jewish Alliance Against the Occupation (JAAO). The same right was earlier given to CJC by Judge Allan Hilton. CJC regards the case as an important test of the responsibilities of student government and of university administrations to protect all students.

Both interventions would have been limited to establishing the effect of the CSU's actions on the Canadian Jewish community.

The JAAO, represented by prominent human-rights lawyer Julius Grey, told the court it wished to intervene on behalf of the part of the Jewish community that CJC does not represent. The JAAO, created in 2000 and claiming about 50 members – all Jews – in Montreal, opposes Israel's military presence on what it calls Palestinian land.

"In my opinion, the court misunderstood the intent and purpose of JAAO's intervention. It would politicize the case and turn it into a debate on the merits or lack of merit of Middle East policy," Bergman said.

CJC sought the appointment of a single judge to the case, Schlesinger said, but Superior Court Chief Justice Lyse Lemieux refused, because it was too early to do that.

Bergman said the election of a new, moderate CSU executive, which takes office for a one-year term June 1, should not be seen as an end to the dispute.

"The supporters of the CSU that was in office in the last two or three years still have positions of importance on the CSU council of representatives and they are vocal," he said.

Israel's fallen martyrs remembered in Winnipeg

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Seven students from Danciger High School in the northern Israeli community of Kiryat Shmona gave Winnipeg's Jewish community a powerful perspective on Yom Hazikaron, Israel's Memorial Day for its fallen soldiers.

They spoke of personal loss.

In a ceremony they led last Monday at the Berney Centre, a program of poetry and song was interspersed with memories of Israeli soldiers – friends, relatives and others from Kiryat Shmona who were murdered or died in combat.

The students – Regev Ben Haroush, Ortal Ben Ayon, Moriya and Eden Malka, Nofar Yacovi, Sima Levy and Yehoram Mor Yosef – and their teacher, Ofer Zafrani, were in Winnipeg for an 11-day visit as part of Partnership 2000 program – co-sponsored by the Jewish Federation of Winnipeg and the Jewish Agency – which links Winnipeg and Kiryat Shmona and Winnipeg's Jewish schools with Kiryat Shmona schools.

Ben Haroush spoke of his cousin, Daniel Haroush, who was the victim of a bus bombing. He was 16 and a student at a military academy in Haifa. Regev read Daniel's father's moving eulogy, in which he spoke of Daniel's hopes of becoming an officer in an elite unit.

Mor Yosef talked about his uncle, a tank mechanic also named Yehoram, who was killed in an ambush in Lebanon in 1984. He was 19 and is buried in Kiryat Shmona's military cemetery.

The students also spoke of Boaz Pomerantz, from Danciger's graduating class of 1999, who was killed in action during Operation Defensive Shield in April, 2002, and they recalled Albert Ederi, who was 26 when he was killed in Lebanon.

Then there was the story, told in a moving song, of two young men from Jerusalem, both named Yuval Harel, who were killed just hours apart in Lebanon in 1982. When the first Yuval was killed, the other's parents were informed by mistake. When the error was rectified, the living Yuval's parents were greatly relieved, so much so that when they were later informed their son had also been killed, they kept insisting there was a mistake.

The Israeli students were very excited about coming here, Zafrani said. Six of them had never been on a plane before.

"Winnipeg is like a dream," he said. "The hospitality, the warmth, the love has been amazing. And it's so quiet. Two days before we left, Hezbollah fired a couple of bombs at our school. Fortunately, no one was hurt. The visit gives our students an opportunity to see what life can be like."

While in Winnipeg, the students visited Jewish schools to talk about life in Israel and met with their peers. They also took in museums and the ballet.

The Yom Hazikaron memorial evening was co-sponsored by the Winnipeg Zionist Initiative, Joseph Wolinsky Collegiate, the Rose and Max Rady Jewish Community Centre, JSA/Hillel and Partnership 2000.

Ottawa Jewish community celebrates Israel's birthday

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — The Ottawa Jewish community came out in force to show support for Israel on its 55th birthday.

Yet there were some notable absences from last week's local Yom Ha'atzmaut celebration at Congregation Agudath Israel.

Gerald Levitz, president of the Jewish Community Council of Ottawa/Vaad Ha'Ir, and 63 others showed solidarity by celebrating together in Israel, as part of the largest community mission ever from this city.

Back in Ottawa, event chair Miriam Algom welcomed eight students from Kiryat Shmona, who were in town on an exchange visit with Yitzhak Rabin High School. She invited them to join the local community to "celebrate in the Israeli spirit."

Israel's ambassador to Canada Haim Divon thanked the Ottawa community for its support through thick and thin, past and present. "I reassure you that we will continue to be strong, with high spirits and we will be proud Israelis and will make all of you proud," he said.

Known for word play, Rabbi Reuven Bulka, of Congregation Machzikei Hadas, explained the number 55 is made up of 50 and five, and using the Hebrew letter equivalents for the numbers, it would spell "hen" which is "a Talmudic way of saying yes."

Rabbi Bulka then urged everyone to "say yes to Israel… by visiting Israel, by supporting Israel, [by] buying Israeli products, etc."

The evening was filled with song and poetry, and featured the Shira Ottawa Choir (whose director Cantor Daniel Benlolo was away on the mission to Israel), the Hillel Academy Choir, led by Ricki Grebler, and the Israella Singers, directed by Shirley Steinberg , in a program titled "We have no other land."

The evening presented an overview of the country's history, from its founding to its continuing hope for eventual peace.

Israeli refreshments and dancing to the sounds of Shimon Pe'er followed the formal proceedings.

Many of the people at the Yom Ha'atzmaut celebration also attended the solemn Yom Hazikaron memorial ceremony for Israel's soldiers the previous evening, which was sponsored by the Embassy of Israel in association with the Vered Israel Cultural Program.

Are you getting all the natural health benefits of salt?

Over 3 million Canadians with respiratory problems may breathe easier today as Halotherapy finally arrives in Ontario! This 100% drug-free, natural, effective remedy has been available in Europe for over 50 years.

Breathing freely again - wonderful deep, cleansing breaths - and no hacking, wheezing, coughing, nasal congestion, pain - can you remember what that felt like? Can you imagine having that freedom again? Second hand smoke, household pollutants, pneumonia, 'sick building syndrome' hazardous material handling, viral respiratory infections, allergies - all side effects of living in a modern society, and increasingly affecting children as well as adults.

Almost 15% of Canadian children suffer from some chronic breathing disease - can you image giving your child an opportunity to breathe freely again, run, play,simply enjoy childhood?

Now you can - using a natural, side-effect-free treatment, Halotherapy. Pediatricians highly recommend Speleotherapy/Halotherapy for treating children suffering from breathing problems, in the periods after and between attacks. Efficacy is estimated as 75 - 85%, while medication intake (that might be the source of allergy and intoxication) is reduced, and the treatment can be used as a sole method or as a part of a complex treatment plan.

Europeans have long had the advantage of special clinics in salt caves to help alleviate their breathing problems. Sufferers know these places: Solzbad-Salzeman and Oberzeiring in Austria, Fürstenzeche, a Duke's Mine in the Bayerischer Wald in Germany, Romania Sieged, Troilus mine at Tirgu Ocna near Slanic, Moldova, Wieliczka in Poland, Tapolca in Hungary, Bystrianská in Slovakia, Nakhichevan in Azerbaijan, Chon-Tous in Kirghiz Republic; Solotvino and Artiomovsk in Ukraine; Berezniki in Russia.

Now Canadians have an opportunity to enjoy the wonderful sensation of Speleo/Halotherapy treatment (without expensive travel to Europe), with the opening of the first Halotherapy Treatment Centre in North York, Ontario. The Centre will reproduce the full natural salt cave clinic atmosphere, with a microclimate aerosol treatment.

Medical experts support bringing this revolutionary treatment to North American shores: "this can help both adults and children with breathing problems in Canada - there is a great necessity for an efficient and safe method of treatment. There are no natural salt cave clinics in Ontario." Halotherapy is recommended for all ages including children and seniors."

Halotherapy works through an artificially created and controlled microclimate, based on. Speleotherapy, which is treatment in a salt cave microclimate. The halo-chamber walls and floors are covered with the salt layer, and dry salt aerosol (NaCl) is blown into the chamber, creating a curative environment identical to the microclimate of salt caves. Experts have noted that " the Halochamber works even better than a clinic in a natural cave. It has all the advantages without a certain level of radiation and gas radon presented in natural caves." Speleo/Halo therapy has been medically recognized to treat the breathing problems of Europeans for over 50 years. It is used for bronchial conditions, chronic bronchitis, bronchiectasis, sinusitis, pharyngitis, tonsilitis, psoriasis, atopic dermatosis, fatty seborrhea, and other diseases. The treatment is also recommended for sufferers of breathlessness, chest tightness, coughs (particularly at night or after exercise), mucosal edema, mucus plugs, wheezing, and other disorders of respiratory tract like rhinitis, sinusitis, tonsillitis, pharyngitis. Of course, it is also good for people who suffer often from colds and respiratory allergies. Smokers can also benefit from Halotherapy, especially significant as 'one in four Canadian smoke cigarettes on a daily basis'. A 12-25 session course is recommended depending upon the disease. Each session lasts for 60 minutes for adults and 45 minutes for children."*

This method of treatment was initially called "Speleotherapy". ("Speleon" stands for "cave" in Greek). The origins of this method are quite peculiar. During the WWII residents of a German city of Ennepetal were using Klutert cave as a bomb shelter. Amazingly, they found they were coughing considerably less and breathing easier with each air raid. Later on it was confirmed by scientists that many of those using the cave as a bomb shelter were indeed cured of their asthma, chronic bronchitis, and other diseases of respiratory tract. The healthy individuals hiding in that cave had strengthened their immunity and stopped catching colds.

The modern basis of speleotherapeutics was established in the 1950's by Dr. Karl Hermann Spannagel . In the town of Enneptal, he used speleotherapeutics to relieve the chronic breathing problems of adults in the community. His experiences and results, were then developed in various speleotherapeutic centres throughout Europe, including Hungary, Austria, Germany, Italy, Slovenia, Czechoslovakia, Romania, Carpathian Ukraine, Russia, Georgia, and Poland. The method was officially named "Speleotherapy".

Scientists developed the medical device called a Halogenerator, or Microclimate aerosol chamber. The modern Microclimate Aerosol Chamber uses state of the art technology to completely reproduce the atmosphere of the clinics located in salt caves or in special mines, and it has a monitored therapeutic microclimate. Air with low concentrations of curative NaCl (or salt) is ionized and saturated with a natural substance, i.e. with highly dispersed aerosol of NaCl. The therapeutic parameters (such as concentration, dimensions, and speed of salt aerosol particles and others remedial factors) are customized by medical professionals according to the individual needs of patients. These curative parameters are preset, and then controlled and maintained by a microprocessor.

Doctors have noted that "thousands of patients have been successfully treated by this method. After taking the Halotherapy treatments their breathing becomes easier. Symptoms such as sneezing, coughing, and shortness of breath are alleviated and patients no longer have to take large amounts of prescription medications."**

The use of prescription medicines is increasingly disliked by many people; some feel overuse can lead to ineffectiveness of the drugs, others simply want a natural way to treat their bodies.

Parents with concerns about the use of prescription medicine on their children will be glad to know that medical research has shown "Halotherapy is most effective in children as they respond exceptionally well to any kind of natural treatment." Doctors recommend parents try this natural remedy before starting children on medications (with their bitterness and side - effects), "or at least alongside medications for further drug illuminations or reductions." Children treated by powerful hormones are far more at risk of bone fractures and cracks. This alternative treatment has an indisputable advantage - it has no side - effects - and efficacy is estimated at 75 - 85%. Excellent results have also been achieved in treatment of children with recurrent bronchitis It considerably reduces the need for antibac terial medications, thus reducing the risk c dysbacteriosis and allergic reactions Preventive treatment of frequently ill children i a Halochamber reduces the risk of reoccur rence of a disease and speeds up the healin process."

Halotherapy has passed many clinical trial and been found safe and effective, and is rec ommended by physicians in many coun tries.* In some countries Halotherapy treat ment is considered as traditional drug-fre medicine and covered by health insurance. Th treatment descriptions and positive outcome are publicized in many journals in Europe. Th US publication, "Aerosol Med" 1995 Fall issue 8(3) carries an article on 'Halotherapy fc Treatment of Respiratory Diseases' . It quote clinical trials confirming the high efficacy an safety of this drug-free method. Halotherapy i also recommended by dermatologists Naturopaths applaud the use of Speleotherap clinics. The clinic has experienced license naturopathic doctors who examine ever patient to determine if an contraindication exists and t make a recommendation of th number of treatments and typ of microclimate suggested i each particular case.

Workers in air-tight offic building are increasingl warned about 'sick buildin syndrome'. The quality c indoor and outdoor air con tributes significantly to th exacerbation of symptoms c respiratory diseases.* This dis order manifests itself with quic onset of fatigue, deterioratio of memory, bad mood, skir eye and nasal irritation, an with allergic reactions of th lower respiratory tract Halotherapy sessions reliev these symptoms, reliev headache, and increase energ level.

Medical practitioners sug gest "Breathing clean air saturated with cura tive salts is recommended to all residents c big cities suffering from environmental pollu tion, even helping you avoid serious, compli cated and long lasting colds. It even boost general immunity, prevents frequent infections improves sleep pattern, and strengthens an prevents excessive perspiration." Patient have felt the Halochamber treatment ha turned their lives around -most of the patient report positive result of Halotherapy as soon a in 7-20 days.

For the latest news about Halotherapy and t make an appointment for a course of microcli mate aerosol treatment, call Olja Keserovic Naturopathic Doctor,The Speleotherapy Clini (416) 739-7777 ext. 43.

Toronto philanthropists save Calgary day school

By JUDY SHAPIRO
Jewish Free Press

CALGARY — Toronto philanthropists have come to the rescue of Calgary's Akiva Academy with funding that will allow the financially troubled Orthodox day school to remain open.

The Israel Koschitzky Family Foundation will provide the 24-year-old school with money to buy its building from the City of Calgary. In two years, the foundation expects to be repaid either in cash or with transfer of ownership of the building, said Akiva co-president Nelson Halpern.

Meanwhile, Akiva will be responsible for maintenance and repairs, but will also be entitled to collect rental fees (it currently shares its building with the Calgary Preparatory School).

Halpern said this income, along with savings from not paying rent and additional funds from supporters in Calgary and Toronto, will cover the approximately $100,000 projected deficit in next year's operating budget, a result of shrinking enrolment from an average of about 100 students during the 1990s.

Roughly half that number have been enrolled since December 2001, when a number of parents withdrew their children mid-year after former principal Rabbi Noteh Glogauer resigned a few months before the end of a three-year contract in an apparent dispute with the school's board of directors.

The Koschitzky family once lived in Calgary, but moved away in the early 1960s because the community did not have the facilities to support an Orthodox lifestyle. The family remains very committed to building Jewish life in Calgary and continues to generously support the Congregation House of Jacob-Mikveh Israel (HOJMI) and Akiva Academy.

(The shul and the school are one legal entity. Akiva's board is a HOJMI committee made up school parents and operates under the halachic authority of HOJMI's rabbi.)

"We've been supporting the school for years, since its inception," said Saul Koschitzky, who heads the family foundation with his brother Henry. "My dad [Israel] started his business in Calgary, and the whole family lived in Calgary for many years. We feel a connection to the city."

With financial and building problems sorted out ahead of the expiration of its lease and the option to purchase its building next month, as well as the deadline to submit its budget to the province in order to get public funding, the school can now plan for the future.

"I think this is great, because it will allow us to turn the corner and rebuild Akiva for the future," Halpern said. "I truly believe there is HaShem, that we have a guardian angel and someone is looking out for us."

As of late last month, 35 students were registered for the 2003-04 school year, and according to Halpern, these numbers are sufficient to run the school. (Akiva has 47 students this year.) He hopes more parents will enrol their children now that Akiva's future is more secure.

The news of the Koschitzky family donation comes after the failure earlier this year of merger talks between Akiva Academy and the non-Orthodox Calgary Jewish Academy (CJA), Calgary's other Jewish day school.

The talks apparently broke down over how to provide an Orthodox program or stream at the CJA and who would control it.

"It has become clear that there is a desire for two schools in this community and we are determined that Akiva continues," Halpern said. "We've been here for 24 years, and we will be here for another 24 years."

For Halpern and others committed to preserving Orthodox education in Calgary, which has about 7,500 Jews, the news of the Koschitzky family's contribution is the culmination of months of effort.

"All the hard work is paying off because of the generosity of others," Halpern said.

"The executive is delighted," Shriar said. "This is an amazing gift."

She said the shul's future is tied to the future of the school, as without an Orthodox educational program in the city, it will be very difficult for HOJMI to hire a new rabbi to replace Rabbi Seth Binus, who died last fall at age 30.

Others have also noted that the absence of an Orthodox school would make Calgary a less attractive home for other observant Jews, which could, in turn, affect community institutions such as the kosher butcher and kosher bakery.

While Akiva's lay leadership has been working to secure the school's finances, its administration has also been working hard to develop new programs to enhance its curriculum.

Principal Jemmie Silver said she is pleased Akiva has been chosen for a pilot project run by the University of Calgary's Centre for Gifted Learning that will allow the school's students to "work at their own ability level in all areas of the curriculum."

Under this project, which will run two or three years, Akiva staff will work with centre director Michael Pyryt, Marilyn Samuels of the University of Calgary's Learning Disabilities Resource Centre (and a former Akiva parent), and graduate students supervised by Pyryt and Samuels to design individual program plans (IPP) for each Akiva student.

Students will still be in a classroom with other children in their grade, but the program will allow teachers to "provide stronger individualized instruction to meet the needs of all students," Silver said. "It is a more formalized way of providing the individualized programming we've offered over the years."

She said this is the first time such a program has been run throughout a school.

"This creative, innovative approach will provide a richer learning environment for our students," Silver said. "Our goal is to achieve high levels of learning for all students and for students to achieve to their full potential."

A MAJOR MEDICAL BREAKTHROUGH IN FAT REDUCTION IS LAUNCHED IN TORONTO!

The Non-Surgical Alternative to Liposuction

Infusion Lipolysis™ is a new medical procedure which shrinks fat cells. It was developed by Toronto cosmetic surgeon Dr. Stan Gore. In contrast to liposuction, which removes cells surgically, the physician infuses medications directly into fatty tissue, which break down and burn stored fat. Cells shrink as excess fat disappears.

Dr. Gore states that LIPIDOCTOR™ programs are safe and affordable. "You only require one medical clinic procedure for each problem area, followed by daily applications of our safe, custom-compounded, transdermal creams. Our Spot-Slimming, Cellulite Defence and Workout Programs are individually personalized for your age, gender, lifestage and metabolism. Compared to liposuction, Infusion Lipolysis™ is gentler, less dramatic, less traumatic, a fraction of the cost!"

Clinical testing demonstrates that patients rapidly achieve visible, measurable improvement. As the measured thickness of surface fat decreases, patients can actually feel their tissue firm up, contour and tone.

Unlike surgical liposuction, Infusion Lipolysis™ allows patients to maintain results indefinitely. "Continue our daily, one minute, home/gym maintenance program to discourage future fat and cellulite accumulation in treated areas."

LIPIDOCTOR™ Medical Slimming Clinics also offer a unique program to optimize everyday workouts while spot-reducing fat. Their goal is to improve muscle definition in problem areas in only two to four weeks. The combined prescription and natural products in the Workout Program not only diminish fat, but also enhance muscle tone, power and endurance. "Casual exercisers, fitness enthusiasts and competitive athletes all love it because it's so easy. Following our clinical procedure, simply apply maintenance Workout Cream daily, before a sports or exercise activity."

When asked what differentiates his approach from over-the-counter remedies, Dr. Gore replied: "Infusion Lipolysis™ is a state-of-the-art clinical procedure, carried out in an established medical facility. No pain; no bruising. You now really can lose fat thickness. And we will prove it to you during your no obligation, medical consultation."

In fact, Dr. Gore routinely does just that. He measures each patient's tummy fat thickness with skin fold calipers, applies a test dose of one or more LIPIDOCTOR™ transdermal creams and re-measures 30 minutes later.

The results are remarkable. This test also helps the doctor predict how much more fat thickness the patient can lose and keep off.

Here is the story behind Dr. Gore's discovery. "I always had problem areas of fat. I underwent two disappointing liposuction procedures in my 40's. They weren't the easy fix I had hoped for. Results were not permanent. To maintain results, I still have to exercise regularly and watch what I eat. In the right hands, liposuction is effective surgery, particularly when major changes in body contour are required. But for smaller problem areas, flabby tummies and cellulite in particular, shouldn't there be a simpler, less invasive, less inconvenient, less transient, less expensive solution?"

It appears that now there is!

Love still blooms at Betel Centre

'Find a companion and live happily ever after,' that's Jean's secret for success

Romance doesn't end at 70, 80, or even at 90, if Morris Bader has anything to say about it. Morris, a widower who turns 89 in May, met Jean Cooper, 77, seven years ago through the Bernard Betel Centre for Creative Living.

Today, he still says, "she's a wonderful, wonderful companion."

A one-time milkman, union organizer, and candy store owner, Morris joined the Centre after his wife passed away in 1995. "I was a basket case … I lost control," he said.

Though his warm extended family did what they could, he says he joined the Betel Centre to help him find "something to do."

Thanks to Anna Halber-Karl, who coordinates the Bernard Betel Centre's V.I.S.I.T. (Volunteers In Support and In Touch) and Dial-a-Friend services, he's found much more. Anna spotted a potential volunteer immediately in Morris, but sensed he needed something more.

Jean was already a long-time Betel Centre member. Widowed a decade ago, her husband, who had also been a member, asked her to volunteer after he passed away.

"He knew I'd be lonely," Jean says. The couple had no children. With her outgoing nature and gift for conversation, she was a natural for V.I.S.I.T., which sends friendly companions out to seniors living alone or feeling isolated.

Jean says Anna asked her "to take Morris under my wing," showing him the ropes as a volunteer. She also gave Morris a little push in Jean's direction.

"Anna said she knew a nice young lady in the same position as me," Morris says. Jean nods, she's heard the "young lady" line many times over the last seven years.

"I paid for coffee," she says. "But I've been paying ever since," he teases her, gently. "We need each other," he says.

Over their seven years together, the pair, who live in Scarborough, have had several opportunities to see the world, taking cruises and going to Florida. But always, they've returned to the Centre and to their commitment as volunteers.

With Jean at the wheel, they continue to visit housebound seniors, both men and women. Jean says the couple's clients are "always very happy to see us." Visiting gives her a tremendous sense of satisfaction. Morris, who isn't able to drive anymore, says the feeling is mutual, as volunteering gets him out and socializing.

Jean is matter-of-fact about her secret of happiness in the senior years: "Find a companion and live happily ever after." Though she makes it look easy, she says, "it's all about what you want to put into it; helping it mature and growing together … taking it seriously."

For Morris, the greatest joy seems to be reaping the rewards of a life spent building a family. After 55 years of marriage, he wasn't sure he'd be able to carry on once his wife passed away.

But his children, grandchildren and great-grandchildren have accepted Jean from the start, drawing her into their family's circle. "There are always birthdays to keep us busy," he says.

Jean says proudly that they marched together in a family wedding last July, and plan to again at another soon. "My family appreciates what Jean does for me," Morris says. "They consider her as part of the family … I hope she feels the same way."

Morris and Jean's romance may not be what teenagers imagine when they picture their dream. But thanks to Anna Halber-Karl and the Bernard Betel Centre for Creative Living, Morris calls their association, "the happiest part of my life."

As Tevye says in Fiddler on the Roof, "If that's not love, what is?"

Both sides should follow 'map,' Powell says

By NAOMI SEGAL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — For those who have been following the Middle East for the past few years, the scene might have seemed all-too-familiar: U.S. Secretary of State Colin Powell visits the region and attempts to prod Israelis and Palestinians to take up yet another peace plan.

But each side puts the onus on the other, and violence continues in the background.

If his public comments are any indication, Powell's message during his talks with Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon and Palestinian Authority Prime Minister Mahmoud Abbas last weekend was clear: the time has come to act.

He called on both sides to take concrete steps to advance the political process.

After meeting with Powell, however, Abbas called on Israel to accept the internationally backed "road map" toward peace and allow Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat to travel freely.

Following his talks with Sharon, Powell called Israeli proposals to improve conditions for the Palestinians "very promising." The measures are expected to include eased travel restrictions on Palestinians and a release of some 200 Palestinian administrative detainees.

But neither Israeli not Palestinian leaders yielded on their core demands, which each presented as critical for progress.

For Israel, these include a Palestinian declaration giving up the "right of return" for refugees from Israel's 1948 War of Independence and their descendants to homes inside Israel.

Israel also insists that the Palestinian Authority take concrete steps to fight terrorism and dismantle terrorist groups.

Palestinian demands include an Israeli declaration that they accept the "road map" toward peace as it is, and end settlement activity and targeted killing of terrorists.

According to a report in Ha'aretz, Sharon and Abbas are likely to meet toward the end of this week, before Sharon departs for Washington.

The planned meeting was announced following separate meetings by U.S. Secretary of State Colin Powell with both leaders Sunday.

Government sources in Jerusalem said Abbas has agreed to the meeting, but a date and venue have not yet been set.

After the Sharon-Abbas meeting, Defence Minister Shaul Mofaz is expected to meet with the new Palestinian security chief, Mohammed Dahlan.

The two prime ministers are expected to discuss ways to reduce the violence and restart negotiations. They may also announce the resumption of high-level security co-ordination between the sides.

Mofaz will then follow up on an offer Israel has already made – to withdraw from any area where the Palestinians assume responsibility for security. He will propose to Dahlan that Israel begin by withdrawing from positions in the northern Gaza Strip.

Following his meeting in Jerusalem with Sharon, Powell called on the Palestinians to take "decisive action" to "disarm and dismantle the terrorist infrastructure." Without such efforts, Powell said, "our best efforts will fail."

He added that progress would depend on "concrete measures" by Israel to support further Palestinian reform. Powell said he and Sharon had also discussed specific measures Israel could take to "immediately improve the situation in the West Bank and Gaza Strip to improve the environment for peacemaking."

Without elaborating on the steps Sharon outlined, Powell said he is pleased that the Israeli prime minister confirmed Israel's intention to take "positive steps in the days ahead," and looked forward to continued steps when Sharon visits Washington later this month.

Sharon also did not give details on what was discussed. Asked about Israel's readiness to halt settlement activity, Sharon reiterated his previous declarations that he is prepared to make "painful concessions" in real negotiations, but will not take steps that endanger Israeli security.

"We repeated to the secretary our sincere wish to move forward in implementing the vision of President [George W.] Bush" from a speech last June 24, "and our readiness to invest substantial efforts in order to make progress and not miss this opportunity," Sharon said.

Israel & the Jewish World

Moderate Iraqi Shi'ites seem tolerant, but how much power will they have?

By MATTHEW GUTMAN
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

BAGHDAD — For now at least, the highest Shi'ite imams in Iraq are practising what they preached during three decades of oppression and assassination under Saddam Hussein — tolerance.

On April 22, after he called on millions of Shi'ites to return loot plundered from the Baghdad National Museum, Sa'id Kamal Din Al-Mukadas Al-Ruweifi gave museum officials 22 Torah scrolls and manuscripts, along with dozens of other artifacts that were stolen.

In mid-April, as the U.S. invasion of the city sucked the last dregs of power from the regime, Iraqi looters stripped the museum of artifacts, air conditioners, even door hinges.

Torah scrolls returned

In an interview with JTA, Ruweifi, a follower of the Al-Hawza Supreme Clerical Council in Najaf and the arbiter of Islamic law for about half of Baghdad's Shi'ites, looked puzzled when asked why he returned the Torah scrolls.

The two purplish, horn-like smudges on his forehead, marks of a devout Muslim who prostrates himself in prayer five times a day, inched upward: "True Islam respects other people's belief in God. Muslims respect others, whether they be Christians or Jews, as long as they respect Islam."

His voice husky with age and sickness, Ruweifi added that Jews once thrived in Iraq.

"We knew many of them. They were traders and lived and worked in the Al-Jorjia district in Baghdad," he said. "We had nothing against them. In Iraq a person's religion does not matter too much to the people."

According to U.S. Marine Col. Mathew Bogdanos, who heads a task force charged with cataloguing and retrieving the stolen artifacts, the "clergy has been instrumental in helping us."

The Torahs were delivered in a "wooden chest with rivets that was about a yard wide, full of scrolls and manuscripts," he said.

Bogdanos' task force had distributed leaflets, put advertisements on the one radio station still playing and walked the streets to convince looters that the " 'no questions asked' policy meant no questions asked," he said.

Little worked, until leaders like Ruweifi stepped in.

The response "was tremendous," Bogdanos said. "They made our job a lot easier."

Preaching last Friday at the Sunni Al-Rahman Mosque, Qassen Al-Tahi, a chief Al-Hawza member, called on thousands of Shi'ites in attendance to follow the peaceful path of the prophet Mohammed.

Instead of whipping the crowd into a fury, Al-Tahi preached patience and tolerance.

"The Americans are civilized and admired in many respects," he told the crowd. He advised his people to respect the Americans and hoped that the changeover to a new government goes smoothly, without affecting "women, children and the poor."

He also chastised the public for looting, but not a word was spoken about the "Zionist plot" or Israel.

While Saddam used the Palestinians ceaselessly to win support across the Arab world, Israel seems to be of little importance to most ordinary Iraqis.

Especially in Sadr City, the Shi'ites seem wary of Palestinians here who glorified Saddam during his decades of brutality. According to reports, hundreds or thousands of Palestinians were kicked out of Iraq as soon as Baghdad fell.

Ruweifi said the imams' "duty to our people is to make them do good, to follow God's wishes, to stop the stealing and the lawlessness."

This means returning the heritage of others, such as Jews, whose history in Iraq dates as far back as anyone's, he said: "It is their country too."

The Jewish community in Iraq dates from the time of the Babylonian exile in 586 BCE. Even though the Persian king who conquered Babylon 70 years later allowed Jews to return to biblical Israel, the majority chose to stay put, as Babylon was far richer and more cosmopolitan than contemporary Jerusalem.

Most Iraqi Jews made aliyah in the late 1940s and early 1950s after growing tensions between the Arab world and the new Jewish state led to pogroms and anti-Semitism.

Today, a few dozen elderly Jews still live in Baghdad, but they refused to be interviewed, fearing for their safety if their religion is publicized.

In the immediate aftermath of the war, Israel made some noise about "rescuing" Iraq's Jews by bringing them to Israel, but it was unclear how enthusiastic the Jews were about going, and the proposal has faded from the headlines.

As for the Jews who fled Baghdad pogroms for Israel in the late 1940s and early 1950s, Ruweifi said they should be welcomed back.

"If elections bring freedom and people want to come back that is their choice. They are our brothers, we must respect all the minorities here," he said.

Humanitarian group shows another 'face' of Israel

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

In a village in the impoverished east African nation of Malawi, two Israeli women have given up the pampered life to dedicate themselves to the long-term betterment of the local population.

Employing the skills they were taught back home, they work at the Chembe AIDS Education Centre & Food Bank, where they hold HIV-AIDS awareness workshops, teach in local schools and help distribute food to the local population.

Funds to purchase the food they allocate has been donated by an NGO (non-governmental organization) that represents the Israeli kibbutz movement as well as by a Jewish NGO in Britain, UKJAID.

This summer, Ve'ahavta: the Canadian Jewish Humanitarian & Relief Committee, will dispatch Bekkie Vineberg, Ve'ahavata's 2002 volunteer of the year, to the village where she will work with the Israelis for four months along with a Brit and another Canadian already on the scene.

For Shachar Zahavi, that kind of co-operation is something of a dream come true.

Zahavi, 27, is the founder of IsraAID, a year-old organization that bills itself as "the Israel forum for international humanitarian aid."

Its purpose is to co-ordinate the activities of Israeli NGOs as well as like-minded organizations from other parts of the world.

Zahavi was in Toronto recently to touch base with Ve'ahavta representatives, to raise the profile of IsraAID and to lay the groundwork for possible future fundraising efforts here.

A veteran of international humanitarian relief work, Zahavi created IsraAID when he saw Israeli NGOs duplicating efforts and providing relief assistance in a less than efficient manner. He felt there was a need for a clearing-house that would inform NGOs about the work of sister organizations, which would, he felt, improve efforts during complex emergencies, such as earthquakes and hurricanes.

Zahavi, who worked in a refugee camp on the Uganda-Rwanda border in 1994 and was in India after the 2000 earthquake, saw first hand during the Kosovo refugee crisis how disappointing it can be to see the response of Israeli groups hampered by a lack of co-ordination.

"It was frustrating," he said. "One group had something, the other another thing."

A little over a year ago he approached a number of Israeli NGOs with his idea of creating IsraAID. So far, 35 Israeli groups have signed on, representing a broad segment of Israeli society: aid organizations, student and youth movements, industry, kibbutzim, religious groups and friendship societies.

Every three months, IsraAID holds a conference in Israel, bringing together its partner organizations along with other NGOs operating in Israel, such as the Red Cross, UN agencies, and Israeli health and foreign ministries.

Not only does it create good interpersonal connections, but participants benefit from lectures and seminars on topics like international humanitarian law, he said.

Through www.tikkunnews.org, a Web site created in conjunction with Ve'ahavta and UKJAID, IsraAID publicizes each group's press releases, informing its members of programs on the go.

Zahavi is keen to promote yet another aspect of IsraAID, one that goes beyond the provision of relief. IsraAID helps improve "the face of Israel," the image of Israel as perceived around the world, he said.

"It shows people that since Israel was established, it has helped many countries around the world.

"Our main goal here is to expose to people in our community and around the world another side of Israel," he said. Many young Israelis are keen to participate in that kind of altruistic effort.

Israeli Friends of Tibet, he noted, helps provide agricultural education to Tibetan refugees in India. Five years ago, Israeli NGOs responded to hurricane damage in Honduras and Nicaragua.

"We were part of a team of international humanitarian organizations and every time they saw us, they had at first a hard time...They don't understand how Israel arrived with 50 tons of relief equipment (blankets, tents, baby food, plastic water containers) and special knowledge.. and were helped there by an Israeli agricultural company."

Working in relief efforts has also improved ties between Israelis and Diaspora Jews.

Both sides worked together in 2000 to respond to a devastating earthquake in El Salvador.

That kind of co-operative efforts helps improve the Jewish identity of Israelis and promotes pride in Israel in both Diaspora Jews and young Israelis, he said.

Rachel Lasry, Ve'ahavta's program director, believes working on aid projects around the world actually strengthens the Jewish identity of its young participants. 'You don't know who you are until you're in a different culture and have to explain who you are," she said.

Co-operation between Israeli and Canadian NGOs is likely to broaden, said Lasry. Four young Israelis are scheduled to join Ve'ahavta volunteers in Guyana this summer, working to provide medical support and AIDS education.

An Israeli businessman in Toronto has donated the use of an apartment for a visiting Israeli who will join Ve'ahavta in its homeless project.

What's more, said Lasry, she will be leading a group heading soon to Israel on a mission which will see them volunteer in Israeli soup kitchens and work at group homes.

For more information about IsraAID, Zahavi can be reached at: 011-972-9-861-3367; 011-972-55-679-979 or by e-mail at: szahavi@hotmail.com.

Children tought to seek death for Allah

By ITAMAR MARCUS

Palestinian Media Watch's reports that document how the Palestinian Authority [PA] encourages its children to aspire to heroic deaths in the names of Allah – called "shahada" – have brought repeated denials by PA leaders in English. However, in the PA's Arabic-language media, PA leaders continue to see encouraging children to seek shahada, as a national achievement.

Palestinian Media Watch

In a candid interview March 4 on PA TV, the director of the Palestinian "Children's Aid Association," an agency whose function is to help children, stated that Palestinians teach their children to aspire to shahada.

The following is an excerpt from the interview:

Moderator: Mrs. Firial, in your opinion, does the Palestinian child understand the concept of shahada?

Firial Hillis, head of the Palestinian Children's Aid Association: "The concept of Shahada for him [the child] means belonging to the homeland, from a religious point of view. Sacrifice for his homeland. Achieving shahada in order to reach paradise and to meet his God, this is the best. We also teach our children to protect the homeland, belonging and to reach shahada."

New PA leadership has so far done nothing: Ya'alon

By AMOS HAREL
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

TEL AVIV — Lieut.-Gen. Moshe Ya'alon, chief of staff of the Israel Defence Forces, sees the recent reforms in the Palestinian Authority as "an authentic internal development, and the battle has not yet been decided." Ya'alon points to PA President Yasser Arafat, and not the Islamist extremists, as the greatest threat to the new government of Mahmoud Abbas (a.k.a. Abu Mazen), who was appointed last month as the PA's first prime minister.

Speaking to Ha'aretz on the eve of Israel's 55th Independence Day, Ya'alon said that overall, given the circumstances, the past year was not such a bad one, and that certainly it was better than its predecessor. Ya'alon thinks Israel's situation is much improved from a year ago, despite the many casualties.

The Iraqi threat has been removed, thanks to the United States, Syria will think twice before igniting the northern border; and the IDF-Shin Bet response to the threat of Palestinian terror is much more effective than it was in the past, even if the terrorists' motivation has not declined. Ya'alon also thinks there is a good chance there will be an internal revolution in Iran that would topple the ayatollahs.

Ya'alon denied that recent military intelligence assessments of developments in the PA have turned sour.

"This is not a question of sourness, but of a very careful look at what is happening. The data have changed. [Abbas'] intention was to carry out [the measures outlined in U.S. President George] Bush's speech [last year]: a reformed government with one decision-maker, who would be the prime minister, rather than [Arafat]; security reform, with three security services instead of 14, all of which would answer to the prime minister; and economic reform, in which money would be managed and supervised so that it did not finance terror.

"That was the platform on which Abu Mazen was elected, but along the way, [Arafat] managed to curtail his authority. We've gone down from half the process [of Palestinian reform] to one-fourth. We certainly identified an opportunity here with respect to a new leadership that waves the banner of halting terrorism, but we also pointed out the risks. The principal threat [to Abbas' success] will not be from Hamas, but from [Arafat]."

Ya'alon said that the new leadership "has so far done nothing. We hear talk about intentions, but the leadership must get organized, reshuffle the security services and disarm Hamas and Islamic Jihad. Since 1994, the PA has led a marriage between a state and gangs that were partially armed and funded by [Arafat]. Now, the PA must not make do with words; it must start to demonstrate intention, effort and results. If intention and effort are there, we will respond accordingly, on the assumption that results will take longer."

Ya'alon is convinced the PA's security services are capable of dealing with terrorist organizations if they are ordered to do so. "But we must point out the risks: that instead of dealing with Hamas, they will reach an understanding on a ceasefire, a hudna, until the storm passes."

Meanwhile, "extremists who extol terrorism identify [what is happening in the PA] as a threat to the only arena in which they currently have freedom of action. Therefore, they have all mobilized to set off a wave of severe terrorism aimed at torpedoing any chance of renewing the [diplomatic] process."

This effort, as the recent attack in Tel Aviv once again proved, is being supported by terrorists from Europe, Ya'alon said.

"This attack is related to earlier incidents, like the infiltration of Hussein Makdad and Jihad Shuman [two Hezbollah operatives carrying European passports who were arrested in Israel]...

"The astonishing thing is who we are dealing with: The Tel Aviv bombers were two British citizens of Pakistani origin, who have nothing to do with us, but they fell under the influence of incitement that led them to come here to murder Jews and commit suicide."

Is this an omen of a cultural or religious war? "We are already there," Ya'alon said.

But despite this last statement, Ya'alon does not think the conflict with the Palestinians is unresolvable. "I don't see things pessimistically. We are at the height of a regional earthquake that stems from America's national security strategy, which has identified targets to deal with in the fields of the war on terror, unconventional weapons and irresponsible regimes.

"If they manage to stabilize a regime with a democratic flavour in Iraq, this will have an effect far beyond Iraq.

"In neighbouring Iran, the internal struggle is at its height. The people voted for reform, but the conservatives still hold the loci of power. Will there be an internal change there? The developments in Iraq could certainly accelerate this process. The Iranians are ripe to get rid of the mullahs."

Nevertheless, he maintained a cautious and skeptical approach: The new Palestinian government, he said, so far does not herald an end to terror, while Syria's promises to the United States are far from being carried out.

Moshe Ya'alon

"The Syrians meet all the American criteria for membership in the axis of evil," he said. "This is an irresponsible regime that has chemical weapons and employs terrorism. There is no doubt that the Syrians are under pressure as a result of the situation they found themselves in after the American attack on Iraq, as well as their behaviour during the attack: They allowed terrorists to enter Iraq from their territory and transferred anti-tank missiles and night vision equipment to Iraq. There are also serious suspicions that Syria helped Iraq to hide some of its forbidden weapons. Syria is currently directly in America's sights because of its behaviour."

Israeli military intelligence depicts Syria as a balloon that is rapidly losing air and sinking. To regain altitude, the leadership must jettison all unnecessary baggage. This means handing over all escaped Iraqi officials in its territory – and later, undertaking a series of steps that greatly interest Israel: allowing the Lebanese Army to deploy in the south of the country, dismantling Hezbollah's rocket batteries in south Lebanon and expelling the headquarters of various terrorist organizations from Damascus.

"These headquarters are not public relations offices, as the Syrians claim," said Ya'alon. "This is a ridiculous denial, like their denial of the chemical weapons in their possession. These are command posts that direct terror operations from Lebanon and in the Palestinian theatre; [they] finance, push, encourage and set policy.

Ya'alon views the American victory in Iraq as an opportunity for reducing the influence and freedom of action of extremist groups and terrorist organizations throughout the Middle East. Will Syrian President Bashar Assad bow to American pressure?

"The determining factor will be the amount of diplomatic and economic pressure. One cannot speak of Assad's decisions as irrational, but there are concerns about his maturity and responsibility. Anyone who, during the second week of the Iraqi war, decides to send a convoy of arms to Iraq raises questions about his abilities," Ya'alon said.

Ya'alon will finish his first year as chief of staff in July. An old adage says that what the head of a large organization does not accomplish during his first year in office will never will get done.

But in Ya'alon's case, it's the second year that is likely to be the most important. This summer, the General Staff will finish drafting plans for a major structural reform of the IDF that is based on three main developments: the American victory in Iraq, the lessons of that war for the IDF and the cuts in the defence budget.

But Ya'alon declined to elaborate on the plan, saying merely that it would "have a significant impact on the size of the army and the composition of the forces."

CMDA resolves tax dispute with Ottawa

"We preferred to have it done this way, because then we would not have a sword hanging over our heads. If a new [national revenue] minister came along, he or she might decide to publish [the de-registration]. Now, there will have to be grounds to do so."

"We are satisfied and they are satisfied," he said. "That's the end of the story."

Bitton said there were no "gaps" in the transition. CMDA has been operating normally throughout; its ability to receive donations and issue tax receipts has not been interrupted.

He said the public will also see no difference as a result of the deal. There has been no change in its name or leadership, and it has the same corporation number and charter.

The threat of CMDA being shut down sparked outrage around the world. An online petition launched by concerned individuals collected close to 160,000 signatures and countless letters of support.

In July 2001, the CCRA notified CMDA that its charitable status was being revoked.

The department cited three main violations. Ambulances donated by CMDA were being used by MDA in the West Bank, Gaza and east Jerusalem, and the CCRA claimed this contravened Canadian public policy.

The tax officials also alleged that these ambulances were not always being used exclusively for medical purposes and pointed to one given to the Israel Defence Forces in 1999. It also questioned why MDA staff sometimes wore bullet-proof vests. CMDA said that was strictly for safety, that the MDA is a humanitarian organization and is not engaged in military activity.

Thirdly, the CCRA said CMDA was in the wrong for not retaining ownership of the ambulances it sends to Israel.

The Federal Court of Appeal last September upheld the revocation notice in a 2-1 decision. However, it was only on the third point that the court found CMDA at fault. The organization, it said, failed to provide evidence that CMDA maintains control over the vehicles and other equipment it provides to MDA.

But, in a landmark ruling, the judges were unanimous that "there is no Canadian public policy expressed in an Act of Parliament or in any publicly available government document that a Canadian charitable organization cannot operate in the occupied territories."

Last November, CMDA filed leave for appeal with the Supreme Court.

On the same day, Bitton announced that CMDA had reached a verbal agreement with the CCRA's charities directorate that would allow it to keep its charitable status, despite the Federal Court of Appeal's upholding revocation. He said CMDA would withdraw its legal action once the CCRA put the agreement into writing. This agreement was reached without any legal mediation, Bitton said.

Bitton believes that National Revenue Minister Elinor Caplan intervened, although CMDA had not directly asked her to. Bitton pointed to the fact that the revocation notice was never published in the Canada Gazette (before May 3), something only the minister has the power to stop. Because of that, CMDA operated normally throughout its legal woes, he said.

Caplan's spokesperson Derik Hodgson at the time denied any ministerial involvement. The CCRA also refused to confirm or deny any verbal agreement or even that it had met CMDA officials.

Ottawa tax specialist Arthur Drache, who represented CMDA, said that in dropping the Supreme Court appeal, CMDA missed an opportunity to establish what the tax rules are on the transfer of charitable goods abroad and how much discretion should be left to bureaucrats.

Network offers support for Jewish singles

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

When Arie Baraf, a 56-year-old school teacher, died two years ago, he had no family.

Other singles who had met him at social events gathered and spoke at his funeral. They met a week later to memorialize their friend.

Two of Baraf's friends, Faigie Siegelman, a school teacher and member of the Forest Hill Jewish Centre, and Mike Ritz, a rehabilitation counsellor who is a member of Adath Israel Congregation, realized that there were other single people in the community who were without family and needed some assistance.

They came up with the idea of creating a group to assist singles.

They called other singles and an ad hoc committee was formed and named, Arie Baraf Chesed Network for Jewish Singles.

Baraf, a teacher at Oakwood Collegiate, had come to Canada from Israel, and lived in Montreal before moving to Toronto.

"He was on a leave of absence. We knew he wasn't well but he wouldn't talk about his ailment," says Siegelman.

Recently, Helen Lightstone, chair of the Inter synagogue Singles Committee of the Conservative and Reform Congregations that meets to share information and document events to avoid conflicts, became involved.

In an interview with Siegelman, Ritz and Lightstone, Ritz said that "Like Arie, I have no close family here. We are getting older and I realized that many singles are in the same situation. There is a need to support each other."

He noted that although many synagogues have chesed committees that do outreach, they usually don't fill the needs of single people.

After the formation of the network, a notice was circulated at singles events announcing the formation of a network of volunteers who would be trained and available to assist other singles.

Twenty volunteers met with Maura Cooperberg of Jewish Family and Child Service, who led a training session and gave volunteers an opportunity to set up their priorities.

"We now have a network within the GTA that is open to all Jewish singles," says Siegelman, who serves as a co-chair with Ritz.

"We are implementing our support system and we are ready to assist where needed."

Their activities will include, homebound visits, bereavement support, befriending newcomers to Toronto, transportation to events or appointments, phoning, and providing resource information.

She says that the network is not a substitute for distress situations and professional assistance.

Siegelman says that the network is being publicized though the singles committees and synagogues, and the group wishes to accept more volunteers who will participate in the program.

For more information, call Faigie Siegelman, 416-787-2999, Mike Ritz, 416-221-3782, or for assistance, call Nilly Korn at Adath Israel Synagogue, 416-635-5340.

Ride for Heart set to roll on June 1

On June 1, more than 14,000 cyclists and in-line skaters will be ready to roll in the 16th Annual Becel Ride for Heart.

From the start line right on the Gardiner Expressway at the west gates of Exhibition Place, cyclists will begin their ride along the world's biggest bike path, in support of the Heart and Stroke Foundation of Ontario.

The key to the success of the Becel Ride for Heart is the enormous effort of the generous participants in collecting pledges to support root-cause research into heart disease and stroke.

Together, corporate team riders and individual riders and skaters are expected to raise $1.45 million — dollars that will go to the 1,000 innovative research projects sponsored by the foundation across Canada.

From an event that attracted just 160 cyclists in 1987, the annual Ride for Heart is now Canada's largest charitable cycling event.

Over the past 16 years, the foundation has raised over $11 million for heart and stroke research through the ride, and contributed to advances in treatment and research that have benefited thousands of Canadians, from newborns with heart abnormalities to long-term coronary and stroke patients.

This year, cyclists will have a choice of a 25 km, 50 km, or the new 75 km route along the Gardiner and the Don Valley Parkway. To be eligible to participate, riders must raise a minimum of $60 in pledges and register before June 1.

Riders receive a Becel Ride for Heart T-shirt and even more incentive prizes if additional pledges are raised. In-line skaters can complete a 5 km, 10 km, or 20 km route on the Gardiner, west of Exhibition Place.

Pledges are the very heart of the ride, and collecting pledges is even easier with on-line pledging. Participants have to first register themselves for the event on-line, then send e-mails to the friends, family and colleagues who they want to sponsor them.

These sponsors can now pledge on-line at: www.heartandstroke.ca/rideforheart, and they will automatically receive an e-tax receipt.

Some ideas for increasing your pledge level include sponsoring yourself for $20; boosting your target by 10 per cent over last year; asking your workplace to match the funds you raise; and advising your sponsors that they will receive a tax receipt for donations over $10.

Six Toronto-area bicycle retailers are registration sites for the ride: Cyclepath, Curbside Bike and In-Line Skate Centre, Wheel Excitement, Gears Bike Shop, Bikes on Wheels, and Sporting Life. These retailers will also be offering bike and in-line skate tune-ups for a fee during the month of May.

Registration for the ride takes place up until the day of the event at various locations in the GTA. Cyclists and in-line skaters can register by mail (P.O. Box 3706, Stn. Industrial Park, Markham, Ont. L3R 6G9), fax (905-479-9707), phone (416-486-RIDE-7433) and on-line, or in person at the six bicycle retailers.

Registrations and pledge drop-offs can be submitted at four Heart and Stroke Foundation check-in centres in the GTA on May 30 (12 p.m. to 9 p.m.).

Call the rideline or visit the Web site for the address of the nearest check-in centre.

Event-day registrations take place between 6:30 a.m. and 8:30 a.m. for cyclists (those wanting the 75 km route or the Early Bird Start must pre-register) and between 6:30 a.m. and 7:45 a.m. for in-line skaters, at the Better Living Centre Building, Exhibition Place.

This event is supported by a team of 500 volunteers. For information on volunteering, visit the Web site, call the Rideline, or e-mail volunteer4ride@hsf.on.ca.

The ride takes place rain or shine for cyclists; heavy rain could force the cancellation of the skating event for safety reasons.

Photographer explores conflict, violence & realism in new exhibit

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Photographer and teacher Daniel Abramson is presenting two series of his photographs at Holy Blossom Temple until May 28.

On exhibit are collections titled The Plagues and Scratching the Surface.

The Plagues contains images of conflict and violence. Abramson says the pictures are a way of coming to terms with his view of the world, a way of searching for meaning in the chaos of destruction.

He said one aspect of his work can be interpreted as being "critical of our apparent desensitization to the violence of the world, and other aspects can be understood as an emotional counteraction to this statement of complacency."

By using the pin-hole camera, Abramson gets a blurred negative. He then scratches the negative and makes an 8-by-10 inch print. He scratches the print with a pin, scans the image on a computer and prints the enlarged images.

"This hybrid process is between hi-tech and low-tech, and between digital imaging and traditional silver-based prints," he says.

Because the scratches take away from the realism of the photos, his street scenes have an impressionistic feeling.

He says the scratches are meant to bring attention to the aspects of the images he finds most compelling.

"The deeply scratched negatives and intentionally incised prints call attention to the true two-dimensional nature of the photographs."

Abramson was born and raised in Regina. In 1996, he went to Haifa University to study Hebrew for eight months. He returned to Canada for his second year to attend the University of Regina. In 2000, he transferred to the Ontario College of Art and Design (OCAD) in Toronto to study photography. He graduates this year with an associate degree in fine arts.

Abramson has participated in several group exhibitions, but the Holy Blossom exhibit is his first solo show.

Last fall, he was the artist-in-residence at the Canadian Council of Reform Judaism during their regional biennial conference in Toronto.

He is currently art director at Holy Blossom's religious school and also teaches comparative religion and Jewish ethics to senior students.

The Holy Blossom Gallery is open Sunday to Thursday from 1 a.m. to 5 p.m.Call 416-789-3291.

Jazz player's performances display considerable skill

By RUTH SCHWEITZER
Special to The CJN

Most of us grumble when we have to pack up our households and move, but not many of us get the urge to write a song about the experience.

It takes a gifted songwriter to create an amusing and sophisticated song out of such mundane raw material as a household move. Jazz pianist and vocalist Don Glaser has done just that and he's recorded the results, the song Moving, on his recent CD Slices of Life.

Glaser, who's also a lawyer, wrote Moving after he and his wife, Carol, a clinical psychologist, moved from San Diego to Teaneck, N.J., in 1992, so their daughters could get an Orthodox education.

In the song Moving, Glaser vows, "another house I'll never buy or rent," because, as he says, he dislikes moving. But a few months ago he broke the promise he made to himself, when he and Carol, along with their four daughters – Faige, 22, Chaya, 21, Eden, 13 and Doren, 12 – left Teaneck for Toronto.

Glaser says he and his wife chose Toronto because it reminds them of San Diego but with a more laid-back atmosphere and because it has a cohesive Jewish community.

Members of the community, many of them new friends of the Glasers, came out in full force to Glaser's two-night Canadian debut at the Top O' The Senator recently.

Don Glaser: straight-ahead jazz pianist.

"It was such a warm atmosphere," Glaser says, "and one of the most wonderful times I've played."

At the Senator, Glaser, accompanied by bassist Steve Wallace and drummer John Sumner, demonstrated his considerable skill as a straight-ahead jazz pianist.

Glazer's spectacular playing, which takes a back seat on the CD Slices of Life, comes to the forefront at a live performance. On the CD, which is made of mostly original material, Glazer's playing is overshadowed by the engaging vocals, both his and his wife's, and the contributions of several other excellent musicians.

During his first set at the Senator the evening I attended, Glaser performed mostly standards. He opened with an original from the CD, Strawberry Jam, a tune about enjoying the small pleasures of daily life. The woman seated next to me was delighted when he did Bobby Troup's Route 66.

Glaser says he tries to appeal to people of all ages with his music, adding that the reason he aims for such a broad age range may stem from his having played piano for his parents and their friends while he was growing up in Oceanside, Calif.

Glaser's parents were musicians – his father played violin and his mother piano – who performed classical music and jazz standards. Glaser studied classical piano for seven years and is a self-taught jazz pianist.

Glaser's first jazz records, by artists such as Woody Herman, Benny Goodman and Ella Fitzgerald, came to him by way of the jukebox of a local soda fountain. He got a new batch of records every two weeks, when the records in the jukebox were replaced. He couldn't read at the time – he was four – but says when he played them at home he "knew which records were which by the labels."

From the age of 11 through his years at Stanford University and 27 years of practicing law – estate planning and appellate work – Glaser has continued to perform professionally, record and write songs.

While Glaser lived in Teaneck, which is close to New York City, he played at some of the Big Apple's jazz clubs, including the legendary Birdland.

Twenty years ago, Glaser, bassist Ray Brown, tenor saxophonist Bill Perkins and drummer Shelley Manne recorded an album he hopes to reissue on CD.

For now, Glaser hopes to play in the city as much as he can to establish himself. He says he enjoys the intimacy of performing in clubs, when musically "everything is co-ordinated and working together and people are happy and smiling." He hopes to record a live CD at the Senator.

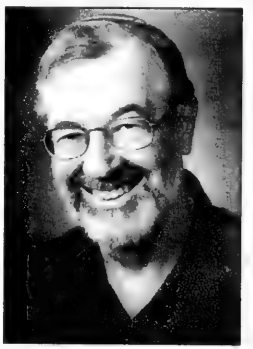
Concert celebrates Srul Irving Glick on the first anniversary of his death

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

A memorial concert celebrating the music and life of Srul Irving Glick will be held at Beth Tikvah Synagogue, 3080 Bayview Ave., May 25 at 8 p.m., on the first anniversary of Glick's death at the age of 67.



Srul Irving Glick

The concert will feature eight renowned Canadian musicians: saxophonist Paul Brodie, violinist Moshe Hammer, harpist Judy Loman, flutist Suzanne Shulman, clarinetist Joaquin Valdepenas, cellist Stefan Glick and pianists Glen Montgomery and Valerie Tyron.

The artists participating in In Memoriam to Srul Irving Glick: A Joyous Celebration of his Works are donating their services for the evening. The proceeds of the concert will perpetuate the performance of Glick's music at Beth Tikvah Synagogue, where Glick became choir director in 1969 and composer-in-residence in 1993.

"For more than 30 years, Glick was the soul of Beth Tikvah Synagogue," says Rabbi Wayne Allen of Beth Tikvah. "His music brought us both comfort and challenge. It was infused with passion, a passion that characterized his life and his life's work.

"For the music community, Srul was in fact a genius. For Beth Tikvah, he was more than that. He was a friend. He was an inspiration and he will be sorely missed."

A prolific composer, teacher and mentor to many musicians, Glick's compositions include secular and liturgical music and orchestral, chamber and vocal works.

Son of a cantor, Glick's music is performed throughout the world. His lyrical compositions are permeated with his deep spirituality.

Born in Toronto, Glick studied composition at the University of Toronto and in Paris, France. He worked as a producer of classical music for CBC and won numerous awards, including a Juno Award, seven Grand Prix du Disque awards and the J. I. Segal Award for his contribution to Jewish music in Canada.

The memorial concert highlights Glick's enormous repertoire and scope, and the program will include his compositions for cello and piano, saxophone and piano, the harp, flute and piano and violin, clarinet and piano.

Tickets for In Memoriam to Srul Irving Glick: a Joyous Celebration of His Work are $25 for general admission. Donation packages range from $180 to $2,500 which include reserved seats, signed CDs, a post-concert reception with the artists and acknowledgement in a tribute program.

Miniseries retraces Hitler's life from childhood to rise to power

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

It is probably safe to say that, of all of history's modern political figures, none has been as thoroughly examined, probed and analyzed as Adolf Hitler.

The massive attention paid to him by scholars, journalists and filmmakers stems from the fact that he had such a destructive and lasting impact on the world.

In light of this, can a new television miniseries about Hitler break new ground?

Hitler: The Rise of Evil, the two-part movie scheduled to be broadcast by CBS and CH Hamilton (Channel 11 in the Greater Toronto Area) on May 18 and 20 at 9 p.m. and repeated by History Television on June 21 and 22 at 9 p.m., offers nothing original about the man, his ideas and his ascent to Germany's chancellorship in 1933.

But is this sufficient reason to skip Alliance Atlantis' ambitious production? In short, no.

The film, skillfully co-written by John Pielmeir and G. Ross Parker and directed with a steady hand by Christian Duguay, makes an earnest attempt to retrace Hitler's ascension to power. Such an exercise is always instructive, given the enormous physical and psychological damage he inflicted on Europeans in general and on Jews in particular.

The actors who portray the malevolent Nazi leader during various stages of his life, Simon Sullivan and Robert Carlyle, acquit themselves honourably. Not once are they out of their depth. Better still, they are backed up by a fine supporting cast.

Spanning a 35-year period from his childhood in Linz, Austria, to his succession as Germany's unrivalled fuhrer, Hitler can be viewed as a cautionary tale of a demagogue whose appeal was due in no small measure to the harshness of the 1919 Versailles Treaty and the economic crisis that enveloped Germany during the 1930s.

Exploiting deep-seated national resentments, pandering to fears about unemployment and communism and stirring up latent anti-Semitic prejudices, Hitler captured the imagination of Germans with grandiose promises of renewed greatness before subjecting Germany to brutal dictatorship and abject defeat.

Hitler unfolds in a procession of impressionistic vignettes, some extremely brief. Our first glimpse of Hitler is as a 10 year old in Linz in 1899, a dour, detached, angry boy close to his doting mother, Klara (Stockard Channing).

The scene quickly shifts to Vienna, where Hitler's dreams of becoming an artist are rudely dashed by the Academy of Visual Arts. His ethnocentric inclinations are soon reinforced by an anti-Semitic speech by the racist mayor of Vienna, Karl Lueger.

In a frenzy of patriotism after the outbreak of World War I, Hitler joins the army. Even on the Western front, where he wins the Iron Cross, he cannot resist the temptation to inject anti-Semitic rhetoric into his conversation. His cruelty is revealed when he whips a dog.

The venue shifts to Munich in the aftermath of the war. The city is bubbling with revolutionary fervour and Hitler, still in uniform, agrees to be an army spy. He discovers the German Workers' Party – the forerunner of the National Socialist Party – and harangues members about the supposed dangers posed by socialists, communists and Jews.

Both Sullivan and, especially, Carlyle, bear an uncanny resemblance to Hitler, and both convey Hitler's unpleasant manner, fierce determination and self-confidence and unflinching loyalty to uncompromising principles.

Several other characters play pivotal roles.

Ernst Hanfstaengl (Liev Schreiber), a cynical German-American who was in the art book publishing business, becomes Hitler's confidant. On the strength of his canny advice, Hitler polishes his image, shortens his moustache and adopts a version of the Hindu swastika as the party's symbol.

Hanfstaengl's comely wife, Helene (Julianna Margulies), seems equally attracted to, and repelled by, Hitler.

Fritz Gerlich (Matthew Modine), a savvy newspaper editor who has taken a professional interest in Hitler's rising fortunes, develops an antipathy toward him. He comes to the conclusion that he is a psychotic, a monster.

In the meantime, Hitler plays the Jewish card to advance his cause, vehemently denouncing Jews as a "plague" that must be removed from the German nation.

As the first episode concludes, the 1923 beer hall putsch fizzles. Although he is found guilty of high treason, Hitler is a given a ludicrously lenient sentence.

In Landsberg prison, where he writes the turgid Mein Kampf with the assistance of the compliant Rudolf Hess, Hitler enjoys deference from a guard and lives in the lap of luxury.

Released only after nine months, he throws himself melodramatically at the knees of Helene, whom he praises as an ideal woman.

This show of misplaced affection is repeated when he falls hard for his niece and probable first mistress, Geli Raubal. Hitler's equally domineering and one-sided relationship with the flighty Eva Braun (Zoe Telford) is depicted in fast, bold brushstrokes.

One of the sobering themes of this miniseries is that Hitler, to Germany's peril, was usually underestimated by his enemies. "Nobody takes him seriously," declares Gerlich's boss, by way of ordering a virtual ban on reporting about him. "He's yesterday's news."

But after Hitler ruthlessly consolidates his leadership and runs for national office, Paul Von Hindenburg (Peter O'Toole), the aging, discerning president of Germany, correctly sizes him up as the biggest threat to German democracy. Despite his misgivings about Hitler, the infirm Von Hindenberg appoints him chancellor.

Strangely enough, Duguay omits the subsequent boycott of Jewish businesses orchestrated by the Nazis.

And, oddly, German Jews, the victims of Hitler's racial fantasies, are given short shrift in Hitler. Apart from several fleeting scenes in which Hitler offends a half-Jewish banker at a dinner party and in which the Jewish composer Friedrich Hollander (Harvey Friedman) is briefly seen, the Jews of Germany are virtually invisible.

As Hitler heads toward its climactic denouement – which turns on Hitler's assumption of unfettered authority after Von Hindenburg's death in 1934 and Hitler's murderous settling of scores with adversaries – it loses some of its momentum. But on balance, in terms of tone, production values and performances, the film is a worthy addition to the ever-growing Hitler genre.

PARCHMENT STORY CHOSEN FOR JOURNEY ANTHOLOGY; COULD WIN $10,000 PRIZE

Cuckoo, a story by Toronto writer Avner Mandelman that appears in the latest issue of Parchment, has been selected as one of 10 Canadian short stories for The Journey Prize Stories 2003, an anthology to be published by McClelland and Stewart in the fall.

"It's the most prestigious prize for short fiction in Canada, bar none," said Adam Fuerstenberg, editor of the annual journal of contemporary Canadian Jewish writing that published Mandelman's story in its latest issue.

"I'm very happy," Fuerstenberg said. "This almost justifies my work on Parchment. This is third party recognition of the fact that what we're doing with Parchment is important."

The 10 stories were chosen from a total of 89 submissions, said M&S officials, who administer the prize with the Writers Trust of Canada. If Mandelman's story is judged the best, he'll win $10,000 and Parchment will win $2,000. The decision is slated for 2004.

An Israeli-born investment dealer living in Toronto, Mandelman learned English as a teenager and has already gathered several impressive literary prizes, including the Best American Short Stories prize and the Pushcart Prize.

Talking to the Enemy, a collection of his stories published by Oberon, was honoured several years ago by Montreal's Jewish Public Library. Oberon is currently preparing a second collection of his stories for publication.

Holding a degree in creative writing from San Francisco University, Mandelman sometimes teaches that subject to young students.

"I tell my students that there are only two purposes to write a short story," he says. "One, so when you pick it up you can't put it down, and two, so when you put it down you can't forget it. Those are the two reasons. There is nothing else."

This is the second time a Parchment contributor has been selected for the Journey anthology. Ottawa writer Gabriella Goliger shared the prize for a story that appeared in the literary journal in 1997. The prize was founded by the late American writer James Michener from the Canadian royalties from his 1988 novel Journey.

Parchment is available from Jewish bookstores or by mail. Send a cheque for $12 for the latest issue or $20 for a two-year subscription to Parchment, Centre for Jewish Studies, Vanier 260, York University, 4700 Keele St., Toronto M3J 1P3.

Jewish Books Web Site: Josh Lambert is a 23-year-old Torontonian who went to the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT), then studied English literature and Jewish studies at Harvard, graduating in 2001. Currently based in the Boston area, he is editor of Jbooks.com, a Web site run by Jewish Family and Life, a company that runs numerous sites on Jewish themes.

Jbooks.com is conceived as a sort of home for all Jewish literary matters on the Internet; Lambert puts out a new "issue" about every two weeks, he says.

In essence, this means offering about five new reviews, an author interview, some chapter excerpts and even an audio selection. The site also offers discussion boards as well as literary links to external reviews and articles of interest.

"We've been reaching out to all sorts of people in the Jewish publishing world," says Lambert, who keeps in regular touch with authors, publishers, reviewers and representatives of various literary foundations and councils.

"People have been signing up for our emailed newsletter from Europe and Australia and all over the States. It's very exciting."

Holocaust emerges as recurrent theme in Italian cinema

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Although Italian cinema has always grappled with difficult, unresolved issues concerning the past and present, the Holocaust was not usually a topic to which Italy's filmmakers gravitated.

"Until the 1990s, very few films were made on the subject," said Millicent Marcus, who recently delivered a series of lectures on Italian films and the Holocaust at a special University of Toronto film festival.

"But since then, there has been a noticeable increase in such films," she observed in an interview.

Several factors account for this phenomenon, explained Marcus, director of the Center for Italian Studies at the University of Pennsylvania.

"The first is the passage of enough time to assuage the collective guilt associated with acquiescence to Italy's 1938 racial laws," she said, referring to the draconian legislation that rendered Italian Jews second-class citizens under Benito Mussolini's pro-German regime.

"Another was the formation of an Italian government in the 1990s that included the Allianza Nazionale."

The party was a reformed offshoot of a post-war neo-fascist movement rooted in Mussolini's Italy.

"In addition, far right fringe groups are enjoying a vogue in Italy today," said Marcus, who is currently finishing a book on Italian movies and Holocaust memory.

The dissolution of communism, and with it the end of the bitter rivalry between the Soviet Union and the United States, also played a role.

"During the Cold War, Italy's historical interpretations of World War II focused on the anti-fascist resistance movement, which portrayed all Italians either as victims or as resistance heroes. This left no room for the particular plight of the Jews in Italy during the Holocaust."

For these reasons, Italians now feel the need to revisit the fascist era, "their own history of racist intolerance," she noted.

Long before these developments, however, Italian directors were making films with Holocaust themes, albeit on a sporadic basis.

One of the earliest was The Gold of Rome by Carlo Lizzani, released in the 1950s.

"It dealt with the Nazis' promise to save the Jews of Rome's ghetto if they could come up with a huge ransom within a few days," she said.

John Turturro in The Truce.

"Impoverished and depleted by the war's privations, the Jews managed to gather the requested sum. But the Nazis broke their promise and deported the entire group to Auschwitz."

In 1960 and again in 1970, Italian directors seized on the Holocaust.

Life is Beautiful

Kapo, a Franco-Italian production by Gillo Pontecorvo, is about a Jewish woman who survived the deprivations of a concentration camp by becoming a guard.

Halliwell's Film Guide calls the movie a "curious exploitation piece which turns tragedy into melodrama, and doesn't even do that with much flair."

The Garden of the Finzi-Continis, directed by Vittorio de Sica, turns on a wealthy Italian Jewish family whose cloistered world collapses with the imposition of the 1938 anti-Semitic laws.

An international box office hit, The Garden of the Finzi-Continis was nominated for an Academy Award in the best screenplay category.

Garden of the Finzi-Continis.

In 1997, Francesco Rosi directed The Truce, based on Primo Levi's The Reawakening, a memoir about an Italian survivor's journey back to Turin after his liberation from Auschwitz.

A frothy comedy that gradually turns deadly serious, Life is Beautiful is described by Marcus as " very atypical, very courageous and ground-breaking in its use of comedy to represent the horror of the Holocaust experience."

"I love this film," added Marcus, who is also the Mariano Di Vito professor of Italian studies at the University of Pennsylvania.

Life is Beautiful left such an impression on her that she dedicated an entire chapter to it in her recent book, After Fellini: National Cinema in the Postmodern Age.

Two of the latest Italian films on the Holocaust, Unfair Competition and Making Love, were screened at the University of Toronto's festival, the first of its kind.

Directed by Ettore Scola, Unfair Competition pits two clothing retailers, Umberto Melchiorri and Leone Simeoni, against each other.

Shown at the Toronto Jewish Film Festival last week, Unfair Competition takes place in Italy in the late 1930s.

Constantly bickering with Melchiorri, his Jewish competitor, Simeoni escalates the feud by injecting a racially-tinged epithet into one of their quarrels.

"A Jew is always a Jew," he curses in an impulsive moment, capturing the temper of the times.

Set in Czechoslovakia and Austria before, during and after the Holocaust, the film is burdened by a convoluted plot but enlivened by a rousing musical score centred around a rare violin.

Like all the previous Italian films focusing on the Holocaust, Making Love tries to make sense of a period that Italians are only now really beginning to internalize and understand.

Red Sox GM aims to end Bambino's curse

By ELI SHUPAK
Special to The CJN

Theo Epstein recently told family friends that if God wanted him at a seder, he'd come up with a rain-out on one of the first two nights of Passover. Otherwise, the 29-year-old Boston Red Sox general manager thought it would have been difficult to take them up on the invitation.

Since becoming the youngest GM in major league baseball history five months ago, the boy-wonder has set his sights on ending Babe Ruth's "Curse of the Bambino" – a drought dating back to 1918 without a World Series championship.

Epstein, who signed a three-year contract, grew up a mile from Fenway Park in the Coolidge Corner area of Brookline and says the Red Sox have always been in his blood.

"It is in a lot of ways a dream job," he said during batting practice at SkyDome prior to the club's final contest of a season-opening 10-game road trip in which the Sox went 6-4.

"I never sat there and actually said I want to be GM of the Red Sox. I just wanted to be involved in a team in a meaningful way. I'm just really lucky that that came to pass in Boston at such a young age."

Epstein's 11-year baseball career began in 1992 as a college intern with the Baltimore Orioles where he organized a major commemoration for surviving Negro League players.

Theo Epstein

After graduating from Yale, he got a job in the San Diego Padres front office, starting in media relations before moving on to the baseball side of things. He worked his way up to head of baseball operations, while completing law school at the University of San Diego.

He says he was fortunate to learn at an early age that he wasn't cut out to be a major league ballplayer and would have to shift upstairs if he wanted to stay in the game. Epstein played on his Brookline High School team, but said his baseball skills peaked at age three.

That he has been so successful in his chosen career path should come as no surprise. Though loath to admit it, Epstein comes from a very distinguished family.

His grandfather, Philip, a famous Hollywood screenwriter, and Philip's twin brother, Julius, shared the 1942 Oscar for their screenplay Casablanca.

Theo's father Leslie was a Rhodes Scholar and is a famous novelist and director of the creative writing program at Boston U.

Theo's sister Anya wrote scripts for the NBC series Homicide: Life on the Street and now writes screenplays. She is married to Dan Futterman, who co-starred in the hit TV series Judging Amy.

Theo is committed to making a name for himself by bringing his beloved Red Sox a World Series title, but he'll be fiscally responsible in constructing that championship club.

"We have a plan that doesn't involve quick fixes," he said. "It involves building from within, planning for the next five to seven years, trying to create a situation where we can sustain success year-in and year-out without having to spend big money on free agents all the time.

"I think the fans understand our plan and will be patient with us. We know that whenever there's a free-spending situation and an open market, we're not going to compete with the Yankees. We certainly have a very healthy payroll, but we do have some limitations."

In the off-season, Epstein added 10 new faces to the 25-man roster, trimming payroll but keeping the team's core intact. Boston was expected to challenge New York for the American League East title and be a team with legitimate playoff hopes.

The baseball aspects of the job have been going pretty much as Epstein expected thus far, but the off-the-field stuff has caught him by surprise.

He says the lack of privacy and the notoriety he's received can be overwhelming and difficult to deal with, but he admits it's getting easier every day.

He now tries to limit interviews to Red Sox batting practice so it leaves him time to do his real job.

He and his staff know a great challenge lies ahead and he clearly recalls the feeling of just how close the franchise came to winning it all back in 1986 when he was just 12 years old.

"I was watching Game Six of the World Series at home with my twin brother," he reminisced. "We were standing on top of the couch for about half an hour ready to jump off and celebrate and when the ball went through [first baseman Bill] Buckner's legs, we kind of collapsed down to the ground. It was a pretty pathetic sight really."

Slam-dunking for Israeli terror victims

NEW YORK — Some 60 teams from across the United States recently participated in a basketball tournament in New York City for Israeli victims of terror. The three-on-three tournament raised about $1,000 (US) through private and corporate sponsorships.

Proceeds will go to the Koby Mandell Foundation – in honour of a teen killed in Israel in 2001 – and Adopt-a-Family, which links Jewish families around the world with families of terror victims in Israel. Winners of the tournament received free trips to Israel.

Anna Pistolesi goes through to last 16

By Ha'aretz Staff

BERLIN — Israeli tennis star Anna Pistolesi advanced last week to the final 16 of the $1.2 million (US) Berlin Open after cruising past Anca Barna of Germany 6-3, 6-2. Earlier in the week, Pistolesi (whose last name used to be Smashnova) demolished Tatiana Panova of Russia 6-1, 6-1 in the first round of the tournament.

Pistolesi broke Barna's serve in the third game and again in the fifth to clinch the first set and went on to break the German's serve again in the first game of the second set.

Pistolesi, who is seeded 16th, later met fifth-seeded Amelie Mauresmo after the French player beat Jelena Kostanic of Croatia 6-1, 6-4.

Anna Pistolesi

Pistolesi was beaten by Mauresmo in the quarterfinals of the Warsaw Cup the week before. Last year Pistolesi made the semifinals of the Berlin Open, where she lost to Serena Williams.

So far in this year's tournament, Pistolesi has guaranteed herself $12,000 (US) in prize money and 38 WTA ranking points.

In other tennis action, Harel Levy lost in the opening round of the Birmingham Challenger in Alabama in a tightly fought contest against Francisco Costa of Brazil that ended 6-7, 4-6.

Zion calls

By JODI KOVITZ

As 20-something Jews living in the Diaspora, what is our role in supporting Israel? It is clear that the future of Israel depends largely on our ability to support the Jewish state – financially and politically. However, for the most part, the media portray the country as a villain, and that makes our task more difficult.

While many of us may be quick to express connectedness to Israel in some way, it is difficult for our generation to feel the need for an independent Jewish state the way our parents' generation did. We as Jews are free to live where we want in North America. We have not been banished from our homes. We have not been forced to stop going about our lives simply because we are Jewish.

Our grandparents and our parents experienced anti-Semitism in a way that most of us cannot fathom – they were hated, treated like dirt and then literally had no place to go. While it might be difficult for our generation to passionately support Israel, I think it is important for us to understand why we have to do so – and do it.

Why support Israel? Imagine that tomorrow the government orders you to leave Canada simply because you are a Jew. What would you do? Where would you go? It seems as if it could never happen, but anti-Semitism is on the rise. In fact, some scholars have recently said the level of anti-Semitism in North America today is equivalent to that in pre-Nazi Germany. This is scary. The reality is that if we had no Israel, we would be lost as a people.

Something I have realized in the past year is that part of my responsibility as a Jew is to stand up and help protect Israel. I used to think that one day I would buy State of Israel Bonds. But it is not enough for me to wait until I am "settled" as an adult to do my part, nor to let others do it for me. Hitler came to power because Jews and non-Jews of all ages were too passive to stop him. I am not suggesting that another Holocaust is imminent. But given the high level of anti-Semitism, particularly on campuses, I believe we have good reason to be frightened.

So, how can we support Israel?

I am moved by those who make aliyah. I am also inspired by people like my sister (who is about to spend the summer volunteering for Magen David Adom), who go to Israel even during difficult times because they feel it is their obligation. However, making aliyah is not for everybody. Neither is visiting when times are uncertain.

There are many other ways we can contribute. We can do so financially, by purchasing Israeli products or making donations to organizations we believe in. We can also do so politically by becoming educated, so that we can speak up against bias in the media and anti-Semitism in our community. We can participate in rallies and go to events and celebrations.

Why not create your own "shuk in the park"? In Toronto, Reviving Eden, a Kolel group for young Jewish adults is putting on a shuk festival in September to celebrate Israel and its culture. If you want to get involved in planning that event or find out how to bring the event to your own community, e-mail shukinthepark@hotmail.com.

While as 20-something's we might be busy finding ourselves, building our careers, exploring the world and fostering our relationships, there is reason too for us to make it a priority to support Israel. With Independence Day just past, we have the perfect opportunity to re-charge our collective commitment to supporting Israel. We cannot afford to be passive as a generation – Israel is depending on us.

Epi on Education

Seymour Epstein

Here we are at Lag b'Omer, reflecting on the fact that Rabbi Akiva's 24,000 students suffered from a plague that killed almost all of them. In Toronto, it is easy enough to relate to plagues, given SARS and the threat of the West Nile virus. But the legend of 12,000 pairs of students is an image I have often wondered about. How did Rabbi Akiva teach? What was the pedagogic mechanism that ensured his saintly teachings would reach us generations later?

All of this is a pause in the counting of the Omer, which takes us from Pesach to Shavuot through some momentous days. Can our young students of today appreciate that the ancient festivals of Pesach and Shavuot and the custom of counting the Omer have been significantly complemented in the past five decades by 20th-century events that required calendar recognition?

The addition to our calendar of Yom Hashoah, Yom Hazikaron and Yom Ha'atzmaut on the 27th of Nisan, the 4th of Iyar and the 5th of Iyar respectively has changed the face of the Omer period. This is another example of our calendar as our teacher, when the actual passing of days takes us through both the tears and the joy of recent Jewish history.

On Nisan 27 we suffer the memory of the Shoah, albeit on a date connected to a moment of great resistance. On the eve of Yom Ha'atzmaut, we mourn the loss of thousands of men and women who gave their lives in defence of our new state. And on the fifth of Iyar we celebrate the great return to our land, the success of the Zionist revolution, the rebirth of our language, and all the blessings of the State of Israel.

It is fitting that our calendar has been altered to include these 20th-century events between Pesach and Shavuot, the holidays that eternally connect us to the joy of liberation and the heavy responsibility of sovereignty and law. As we count our way through the 21st-century version of the Omer, we learn the happiness of freedom, the tragedy of monumental loss, the terror of sacrifice, the pride of ownership, the burden of authority, the responsibility of the landlord and the guidance of law and custom – all from 49 special days in our calendar.

Jews up 3.7%, census shows

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

Community officials caution not to put too much stock in figures released last week from the 2001 census that show Canada's Jewish population grew by a modest 3.7 per cent over the previous decade.

Planners say the numbers reflect Jews "by religion" only, and need to be blended with census figures on ethnic origins released in January. They say the net result will yield a higher number that paints a clearer picture of Canadian Jewry.

However, some experts have a gloomier outlook, noting the latest figures, although reflecting an increase, are disappointing and portend a shrinking and polarized community.

The census showed there are 329,995 Jews by religion in Canada, up from 318,185 in 1991. However the proportion of Jews as a percentage of the general population dropped from 1.2 per cent to 1.1 per cent.

The overall increase – 3.7 per cent – is the smallest rise among all major non-Christian faiths. By contrast, Muslims increased by 121 per cent to nearly 580,000, eclipsing Jews as the country's largest non-Christian group. As well, for the first time, Muslims now outnumber Jews in both Toronto and Montreal.

Sephardi conference planned for Montreal

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Concordia University will be the site of an international symposium on Sephardi culture this month, but organizers say they will steer clear of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict.

The symposium, called Sephardic Identities and Modernity, will be held at the Sir George Williams campus May 25 and 26 by the new Sephardic Cultural Institute of Canada, in collaboration with the Concordia-UQAM chair in ethnic studies. Though the chair is a joint program with the Université du Québec à Montréal, it operates with two autonomous divisions, and UQAM is not participating in this event.

About 50 scholars and community leaders from Canada, the United States, Israel, Spain and France will participate, including Nissim Gaon of the Swiss-based World Sephardi Federation.

Concordia to host symposium

Judah Castiel, the institute's founder and president, said he chose Concordia as the venue because he believes the university must be given an opportunity to provide a platform for intercultural dialogue after having gained notoriety over the past year for discord.

"When we asked Concordia to join us in this important project, we were warmly received," Castiel said.

Daniel Salée, acting director of Concordia's chair in ethnic studies, said the conference fits in with the chair's mission to reach out to ethnic groups and promote research on identity issues.

"The study of inter-community relationships and cross-cultural dialogue are at the heart of the chair's activities," he said.

Salée added that Concordia rector Frederick Lowy is also interested in initiatives that promote dialogue, given the tense atmosphere on issues related to the Middle East on his campus.

"The goal of our first international symposium is to provide a forum for reflection on the historical, social, cultural and religious dimensions of contemporary Sephardism," Castiel said.

Among the scheduled topics are: Marranos, Jewish Memories in Spain; the Contribution of Sephardic Women; Sephardic Music: from the Sacred to the Profane; as well as sessions on Sephardi thought, literature and contemporary art. Controversial issues, such as the troubled history of Jews in Arab lands, will be avoided.

The News in Brief

Canada

Webcaster Cautioned

TORONTO — B'nai Brith Canada has cautioned JumpTV that it will hold the Internet broadcaster responsible for any broadcasts of hate material on Al Jazeera, the Qatar-based independent TV network. JumpTV recently added Al Jazeera to the international channels it offers subscribers. The network has been accused of broadcasting virulently anti-Semitic and racist stories likely to contravene Canadian law.

Israel

A-G Backs Chief Rabbi

JERUSALEM — The High Court of Justice last week heard a petition challenging the recent appointment of Israel's new Ashkenazi chief rabbi, Yona Metzger, despite pleas by Attorney General Elyakim Rubinstein to reject it. Rubinstein said no police complaints had been filed regarding the sexual harassment allegations in the petition, so there was no need for legal intervention. He had, however, reportedly planned to ask Rabbi Metzger not to sit as head of the Supreme Rabbinical Court because he had not completed his rabbinic judicial studies. The court will issue its ruling at a later date.

Bible Quiz Winner

JERUSALEM — Moran Gomeri, 16, won the annual World Jewish Bible Quiz for youth earlier this month, defeating 15 other teens from eight countries in the finals. Gomeri, the daughter of a Bible teacher, is in Grade 11 at a girls' yeshiva in Be'er Sheva. She won a scholarship to Tel Aviv University.

No. 2 for Skin Cancer

JERUSALEM — Israel has the world's second highest skin cancer rate, behind Australia. The high rate is believed to be due to ignorance of the risks of suntanning, as well as genetic defects among Sephardi Jews. According to the Israel Cancer Association, some 200 Israelis die every year from the disease. This week is skin cancer awareness week in Israel.

U.S. Muslims Deported

JERUSALEM — Israel has deported at least two U.S. Muslims who were staying in the West Bank and Gaza. The deportations were part of measures adopted after an April 30 suicide bombing in Tel Aviv by terrorists with U.K. passports. Deportation orders were also issued against foreign activists arrested in the West Bank earlier this month on suspicion of involvement in terror.

World

Concert Postponed

WASHINGTON, D.C. — A May 19 concert here to mark Israel's 55th birthday has been postponed until Dec. 18. Organizers denied speculation poor ticket sales were the cause, saying it was postponed due to the sensitive nature of Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's visit to Washington the following day. The event was to have featured comedian Jerry Seinfeld and singer Tony Bennett. Organizers had hinted U.S. President George W. Bush and Sharon might attend, but the White House said the event was never on Bush's calendar.

Israel Boycott Fails

LONDON — A British teachers union rejected a motion to boycott Israeli academics. By a 2-1 vote, the Association of University Teachers rejected a motion by Sue Blackwell, a pro-Palestinian activist from Birmingham University, for AUT members to "review immediately, with a view to severing, any academic links they may have with official Israeli institutions, including universities." Andy Marks of the International Academic Friends of Israel, said the AUT came to the "right conclusion," but he was concerned "such a motion ever made it on their agenda."

Iranian Jew Arrested

LOS ANGELES — A not guilty plea was entered on behalf of an Iranian Jew who was charged with a series of arsons on religious buildings in Los Angeles. Farshid Tehrani was charged last week with 12 counts of arson, terrorism and vandalism for attacks on three synagogues, a Baha'i centre and a Presbyterian church over a recent two-week period. He is being held on $750,000 bail. If convicted on all counts, he could face 22 years in prison. Tehrani, 40, came to the United States from Iran 16 years ago.

Internet Service Provider Drops Zundelsite

TORONTO — QWest Communications, the Denver-based Internet company that hosted Ernst Zundel's neo-Nazi "Zundelsite," announced last week it was removing the site from its servers. However, the Web site, which has been condemned by the Canadian Human Rights Commission (CHRC) for inciting contempt of Jews, quickly switched to another Internet service provider and is still available on the Web.

A spokesperson for QWest said the site was removed after QWest was informed by the CHRC that Zundel was using it to publish hate materials. QWest policy prohibits distribution of hateful, obscene, abusive or excessively violent material.

The Web site, meanwhile, denounced the move, saying QWest "caved in" to pressure from "the fanatic censors in the Canadian Government." In a "ZGram" ostensibly written by Ingrid Rimland, Zundel's wife, the CHRC is described as "that obscene Marxist-flavoured outfit."

Rimland claimed the CHRC "served QWest with a 75-page order to 'cease and desist' [hosting the site] within 48 hours – or have QWest employees face arrest for contempt of court, should they ever travel to Canada!"

QWest denied the allegation.

Zundel, meanwhile, remains in custody pending conclusion of a Federal Court review of a government certificate alleging he is a security threat. Should the court uphold the finding, Zundel could be removed to his native Germany.

$600,000 gift puts Yiddish program on firm ground

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

The University of Toronto's faculty of arts and science recently honoured Al and Malka Green for a $600,000 gift that will help fund the school's Yiddish studies program in perpetuity.

U of T program renamed for Greens

When combined with $400,000 in endowment funds and donations raised by UJA Federation's committee for Yiddish studies, the Greens' 2002 donation will create a $1-million endowment to support Yiddish language and literature courses at U of T.

As well, the endowment will allow the program to bring distinguished visiting lecturers to campus, increase U of T's library holdings in the field, and support lectures, colloquia and other forms of public outreach.

Although the Yiddish progam has been a fixture at U of T for three decades, the uncertainties of funding have made it difficult to ensure its quality and continuity from year to year, said Marvin Schiff, chair of the committee for Yiddish studies.

"Now, the gift from Al and Malka Green not only gives the program permanency, but gives it a firm foundation on which to grow and improve and it allows it to claim a permanent place among the major universities of the world that offer courses in Yiddish, including Hebrew University of Jerusalem, Oxford, the Sorbonne and Harvard," he said.

Green is the principal partner in Greenwin Property Management and an acclaimed sculptor.

In recognition of their generosity, the program has been renamed the Al and Malka Green Program in Yiddish Studies, Schiff said.

Rose Wolfe, chancellor emerita of U of T and Prof. Carl Amrhein, dean of arts and science, co-hosted the reception and dinner in the Greens' honour at Massey College.

The rabbi's trauma

From the editor's desk

One of the various stresses tugging at the multi-coloured, multi-textured fabric of Israeli society is the struggle between the observant and the non-observant.

In lieu of the terms "observant" and "non-observant," some people substitute "religious" and "secular," "practising" and "non-practising," "believing" or "non-believing," or "fervent" and "epicurean."

In truth, however, these terms are woefully inadequate because there are so many gradations of differences within each group.

As a result, the use of the terminology is worse than meaningless. It is harmful. It further stresses an already highly stressed Israeli public. And it creates more categories into which individuals are pigeonholed like marker pins in a pinochle board, thus further setting apart one person from the other.

But there is no gainsaying the existence of this particular stress within Israeli society, whatever it is called. Nor is there any denying the profound importance of ameliorating it (and of course, all of the other stresses) to help reduce the growing distance between some Jews.

A book recently published in Israel may help, in some small measure at least, to reduce those distances.

The book, a memoir written by a "religious" Israeli, recalling his service in the tank corps on the Golan Heights in the Yom Kippur War, was acclaimed by critics and lay readers alike when it was first published in Hebrew in 2002 as Tiyum Kavanot. It has now been published in English by Toby Press, under the title Adjusting Sights, to equally high praise.

A recent review in the Jerusalem Post noted the opinion of Israeli television and theatre actor Ili Gorlizky, "a self-described secularist": "Without thinking twice, I can say this is the best Israeli book I have read in recent years. [The author] has so much power with the Hebrew language that comes from a place of Jewish education and tradition. But he also reaches every man. I relate to him because he thinks deeply; he relates common experiences and his words took on a philosophical dimension for me."

The same review noted a letter written to the author by one of hundreds of readers. The letter writer, a young Israeli woman travelling in India, "in search of meaning to her life," said she was so moved by the book that she decided to return to Israel after she read it.

The memoir's author is Rabbi Haim Sabato, the rosh yeshiva of Yeshivat Birkat Moshe in Ma'aleh Adumim. Last week, I visited Rav Sabato at his school.

Born in Cairo, he and his family, along with most of Egyptian Jewry, immigrated to Israel in 1957. Though his family came from Egypt, they are, in fact, Syrian Jews from Aleppo. Rav Sabato is the latest in a long line of rabbis.

The rabbi appeared much younger than his 50 years. Warm brown eyes extended greetings of welcome to the older contemporary visiting from Canada. And then, he immediately provided his visitor with a bottle of cold water to slake a 35-degree, chamsin-induced thirst.

We sat down in his office and our 40-minute conversation sped by in what seemed to be three or four. We discussed many subjects. He agreed with my observation that he was one of the few "religious" Israelis to write about their wartime experiences. The following is a partial excerpt of his response.

"Not out of a sense of pride, but merely as a statement of fact, I wish to say that the book appears to be causing somewhat of a change in the country.

"There has been a gap here between the world of Torah and the literary world… When an Israeli writer writes about faith, about prayer, or about God, he does so as an observer from outside, sometimes even as a caricature, ironically, or politically, sometimes even sincerely but naively, and generally without any depth and certainly not out of any sense of profound personal experience.

"On the other hand, the world of the yeshivot has mostly scoffed at the world of modern literature…

"But after the book was published, I received many letters from renowned scholars of the yeshiva world who congratulated me for the work. I also received a great many letters from individuals on the extreme left of the political spectrum commending the book.

"I must also confess that I was surprised the book seems to have generated a positive reaction from some parts of the haredi world as well. I received a letter from the rosh [yeshiva] of a small haredi yeshiva who said he read the book during the afternoon break on Yom Kippur before the Ne'ilah service."

I asked Rav Sabato if he believed his book could actually help to close the gap between the worlds. He answered openly but not naively.

"There are generally two processes at play when one considers the matter of change in society," he said. "One is political and public relations; the other is educational and humanitarian. I think we pay far too much attention to the first process, the political one, and not enough to the other, the educational one. In my view, a meaningful line of prose from sincere writers can influence individuals far more than political argumentation and gimmickry. But it takes time, a great deal of time."

Throughout our conversation, Rav Sabato was polite, friendly, thoughtful and generous in his responses. Next week I shall review his book.

Associated reps face parents over tuition increase

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

More than 300 Associated Hebrew Schools parents met with representatives of the school's administration in a town hall meeting last week to discuss next year's 12.5 per cent increase in tuition.

Presentations were given by Associated executive director Arthur Landa, president Sheldon Carr, past president and board member Sheldon Goodman, incoming president of the parent-teacher council Joanne Perlmutter, co-chair of the education committee Sally Zigler and the chair of admissions and tuition committee Jim Klein.

In a sometimes heated question-and-answer period, parents were told there is no chance tuition will be reduced for next year. In addition, they were encouraged to take their concerns to UJA Federation and urge it to reconsider its funding formula for day schools, which has been affected by federation's allocation of emergency aid for Israel.

Panel members told parents that Associated's enrolment for next year is down by 150 students – 100 elementary and 50 preschool.

While this was not the only reason for the tuition increase, the school representatives said it accounts for $870,000 in reduced income next year.

Associated's tuition for the 2003/04 will be $9,000, up from $7,950 this year. Tuition at other Jewish day schools in the city ranges from about $9,500 to $11,550.

Landa has said that without the increase, Associated would have faced a $1.3-million deficit next year.

Dropping enrolment is a problem facing many Jewish day schools in the city, Goodman said, adding that "Jewish education in North America has been declining for the past 10 years and is now considered to be in an emergency situation."

Goodman suggested the enrolment drop isn't necessarily driven only by higher tuition, noting that over the past few years there has been an increase in the number of Jewish students at non-religious private schools.

However, many of the parents at the meeting voiced concern about the rising costs of tuition and wondered about their ability to continue paying for Jewish education.

In a phone interview, Landa said the ratio of financially assisted students (37.5 per cent) to full fee students (62.5 per cent) at Associated has remained stable for the past four years.

In addition, Landa noted that $450 of each child's tuition next year will go toward a shortfall in community funding for subsidized students. This year the school absorbed the shortfall, which formed part of its deficit.

While it's generally acknowledged that UJA Federation spends more in Jewish education per capita per child in Toronto than any other city in North America, problems in school funding have emerged over the past few years that need to be addressed, Landa said.

In 1999, a strategic planning report from the Associated's Va'ad Hachinuch (education committee) indicated that investments were needed to improve the programs available at the school, Carr told the meeting.

However, at this point, it's clear the school needs to work with parents to develop new strategic plans, Landa said.

Seymour Epstein, executive director of UJA Federation's Board of Jewish Education, said studies are underway to investigate the causes behind declining enrolment, especially in the number of subsidized students.

The BJE is currently reviewing the subsidy guidelines that form the basis of the applications used by most schools.

"The guidelines are antiquated," he said, adding that the forms are based on salaries from 12 years ago and are not necessarily sensitive to the needs of today's parents.

"The rising cost of being Jewish is a universal problem. We have complete empathy for both sides," he said.

Government distances itself from IRB decision

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Citizenship and Immigration Minister Denis Coderre last week distanced the federal government from a ministry lawyer who had argued in a refugee case that Israel committed war crimes in southern Lebanon.

The lawyer's position "surely doesn't reflect... the policy of Canada towards Israel," he said.

The minister was responding to reporters' questions about a decision of an immigration adjudicator who rejected the refugee claim of a Lebanese businessman, saying the claimant served as an informant to Israeli forces that were involved in war crimes and crimes against humanity in southern Lebanon.

The adjudicator made his ruling after a lawyer representing the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration joined the case and argued there were serious reasons for believing the claimant, who was not identified, committed war crimes or crimes against humanity.

Relying on evidence that consisted primarily of press reports, internal Immigration and Refugee Board (IRB) documents and studies by Human Rights Watch and Amnesty International, adjudicator Stéphane Handfield ruled the claimant "is complicit by reason of his personal and knowing participation in crimes against humanity committed by Israel [the Israeli intelligence service] and its militia, the SLA [South Lebanese Army]."

The adjudicator's decision angered Jewish organizations, while the Israeli embassy denied Israeli involvement in war crimes or crimes against humanity.

"The gratuitous accusations against Israel are baseless," said Joseph Wilder, national chair of the Canada-Israel Committee. "In their operations in Lebanon, first against PLO terrorist bases in the 1970s and early 1980s and then against Hezbollah, Israeli soldiers always abided by the highest moral and ethical standards."

A statement issued by the Israeli embassy said, "Israel did not and has not been involved in any war crimes or crimes against humanity in southern Lebanon or any other place. On the contrary, it is continuing to give humane treatment even under the most difficult conditions as a result of violence directed against it by terrorist organizations."

Canadian Jewish Congress spokesman Eric Vernon said while CJC hopes the adjudicator's decision will not serve as a precedent for future cases, it will seek a meeting with the IRB president to voice its concerns.

"Our view is that if you're going to make claims of war crimes or crimes against humanity you have to have legitimate evidence that would stand up in an international court and that would support those references," Vernon said. "Under international law, there is a threshold of evidence that has to be met and it hasn't been made in this case."

But Canada-Israel Committee executive-director Shimon Fogel said the CIC is satisfied with Coderre's comments. He said he had been in touch with government officials and was told the lawyer's position is "absolutely no reflection whatsoever of Canada's view of Israel. The minister in effect repudiated the lawyer's comments."

Still, he said, "We'd like to understand what latitude a lawyer has when representing the government to take a position like that."

The IRB decision, which was dated Nov. 8, 2002 but was released only recently, found that the claimant was recruited in 1998 to provide information about Hezbollah to the Mossad. An opponent of the Islamic terrorist organization, he readily agreed and for about one year, was paid $800 (US) a month to do so.

The adjudicator found the claimant's information about Hezbollah was passed to the Mossad and then on to the SLA, which he said was controlled by Israel. "The documentary evidence paints a picture of crimes committed by the SLA and Israel, including the displacement of civilians, hostage taking, the destruction of houses, arrests, detention without trial, forced recruitment, homicide, torture and atrocious crimes committed at the Khiam prison in south Lebanon."

Ben Forer, press and economic affairs officer for the embassy of Israel, said despite the involvement of a government lawyer in the case, "I do not believe it is official Canadian policy to accuse us of war crimes."

Heschel pioneers new approach to assessing kids

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

Over the past few weeks, the Toronto Heschel School's senior kindergarten classroom has been immersed in old computer parts, screwdrivers and wrenches.

This is Project Spectrum time and the kids are taking part in a two-way learning process.

While the children are busy taking apart old keyboards and hard-drives to understand the relationship of the smaller parts to the larger machine, Toby Franklin, a learning specialist and the co-ordinator of Heschel's Spectrum team, walks around and observes each student's strengths and weaknesses in relation to the child as a whole.

Project Spectrum was developed at Harvard and Tufts universities in the 1980s to provide an innovative approach to assessing and understanding the learning styles of children.

It builds on the theory of multiple intelligence developed by psychologist Howard Gardner, a professor of cognition and education at Harvard's Graduate School of Education (GSE). The theory suggests that all children possess seven or eight different "intelligences" – from musical to linguistic to social – and that learning can occur through any of these pathways.

According to Gardner, every child can be directed toward achieving their potential with an education plan that takes into account their various intelligences.

Spectrum brings together teams of educators to develop classroom projects that can help assess children along various "intelligence" domains, including science, music, movement, math, social understanding, language, visual arts and mechanics and construction.

"It's an approach to learning that fits in with our school philosophy and environment," said Gail Baker, the principal of Heschel, an arts-based day school established in 1995 and the only Jewish school in the city to have a Spectrum program.

Franklin learned about Spectrum while attending a workshop last summer at Harvard's GSE. A UJA Federation Board of Jewish Education grant helped Heschel start the program this year.

Franklin and Ellen Kessler, the school's science co-ordinator, meet once a week to plan the activities. The regular contact allows them to change the projects to meet the demands of the curriculum and to account for the strengths and weaknesses of the children in each class.

Teachers then apply the different projects in the classroom while a trained observer watches how each student interacts with the task at hand, Franklin explained.

The activities, which take place in the junior and senior kindergarten and Grade 1 classes, help teachers understand the whole child because they focus on process and not solely on end results, like other IQ tests, Franklin said. She added that the training involved in implementing the program helps educators expand their vocabulary so children can be seen in different ways.

Toby Franklin helps senior kindergarten students. Inset: Noah Benson participates in Spectrum project.

"Many of the activities allow the children to experience new things and build self confidence in areas they might not otherwise attempt," said senior kindergarten teacher Marlee Pinsker.

For example, taking apart machinery opens the door to three-dimensional learning, a skill needed in geometry and architecture. Watching young children as they work in that domain allows educators to identify whether they need help developing that ability or if strengths in that skill can assist them in other areas, Pinsker said.

"Kinesthetic learners [who excel at physical activities] often have a hard time with cognitive learning," said Lori Shapero-Press, Heschel's movement co-ordinator.

Shapero-Press said that by using Spectrum, teachers can assess the tools a child uses in a particular activity and develop a program to help them build on their strengths.

No chance if Arafat remains

This editorial was written before the scheduled meeting last Saturday night between Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon and the Palestinian Authority Prime Minister Mahmoud Abbas. The meeting was to be the first public contact between the two men as prime ministers.

It was seen by many commentators in Israel as a goodwill gesture by both Israel and the PA to U.S. President George W. Bush, an effort to maintain the modicum of momentum garnered last week by Secretary of State Colin Powell's visit to Israel.

But less than a week after Powell's departure, that momentum seems to be dissipating.

Abbas has been determined to consult with Palestinian factions in the Gaza Strip, including Hamas and Islamic Jihad, about a ceasefire in the ongoing violence against Israelis.

But Israel has rejected the idea of a ceasefire. The very notion presupposes the possible resumption of violence at a later date. It maintains the status quo of the terrorist infrastructure, and worse, it confers a kind of legitimacy upon the resumption of violence in the minds of those who are its bloodthirsty proponents. Israel, therefore, correctly rejects the notion of a ceasefire.

The West should encourage Abbas to abandon the idea. More to the point, he should be encouraged by western governments, including that of Canada, to actively root out terrorist groups within Palestinian society.

There is also another factor contributing to the sense of dissipating momentum toward positive results in the quest for peace between Israelis and Palestinians: the persistence of PA President Yasser Arafat's grip on the PA apparatus. As long as the corrupt leader is involved in PA decision-making, there will be no chance for peace between the Israelis and Palestinians.

The daily newspaper Ha'aretz reported last week that not only is Arafat still involved in PA decision-making, he is believed by Israeli security officials to be "strengthening his hold on the Palestinian Authority." Israeli officials also believe that 27-year-old Gideon Lichterman of the West Bank community Ahiya was killed two weeks ago by a terror cell that actually departed for its murderous assignment from the Muqata, Arafat's compound in Ramallah. That the murderers received their orders from inside the Muqata is thus highly likely. That those orders were issued with Arafat's prior knowledge is also highly likely.

Israeli Defence Minister Shaul Mofaz last week told a CJC-sponsored delegation of Ontario municipal politicians and officials that Arafat is one of the main obstacles to the fulfillment of Palestinian aspirations for independence.

That should worry western governments and Palestinians as much as it does Israel.

In defence of Human Rights Watch

In his column, "Well-intentioned support for Israel-bashers" (CJN, May 8), Gerald Steinberg accuses Human Rights Watch in its reporting on Israel of repeating partisan information that is "rarely subject to independent confirmation."

But in fact, Human Rights Watch researchers personally investigate allegations of human rights abuse by all parties to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. Human Rights Watch would never be so naive as to repeat charges brought by one side or the other without its own independent inquiry.

Take, for example, Human Rights Watch's investigation of the fighting that occurred a year ago in the Jenin refugee camp. If Steinberg were right, Human Rights Watch would have simply repeated the widely disseminated claims that Israeli forces had committed a "massacre."

Instead, Human Rights Watch sent a team of researchers into the camp and, based on a detailed, first-hand, cross-checked investigation, concluded that there had been no massacre, although Israeli forces did violate the Geneva Conventions in other respects.

That finding put an end to the unfounded massacre allegations.

Such detailed, on-the-ground investigations are typical of Human Rights Watch's work around the world, and certainly of its work on the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. Even the slightest effort by Steinberg at "independent confirmation" of his own allegations would have demonstrated that fact.

Holocaust Centre ignored

Every week I go through the pages of The CJN, and rarely find a mention of the Holocaust Centre of Toronto. Tens of thousands visitors, mostly students, come here. They see the exhibits, watch a video of the horrible experiments conducted on prisoners in the death camps and listen to the survivors' testimonies.

It is very important to reach these young people before they attend universities, colleges and other places of higher learning, and maybe show them how to withstand the indoctrination of the left and anti-Semitic groups that are so active in their hate-filled campaigns.

One group I spoke to recently came from Barrie, and the following are some remarks I heard.

One lady said that until now, all she knew about the Holocaust was from what she read, but she found it completely different to hear about it from the personal experience of a survivor. Another said she had a Jewish grandfather. A young man proudly said the Jewish residents of Barrie are building a synagogue.

On the way out, a young man approached me, saying he was sad and he feels sorry that I lost my entire family to the Nazis. Dear James, you don't know how much it meant to me to hear this. This remark and others restored my faith in younger people. It also makes my contact with them meaningful.

Praise for staff

This letter is dedicated to the amazing nurses and the entire staff at the Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care.

Because of the SARS virus, this has been a very trying time for the residents, but much more stressful for our exceptionally caring CEO, Stephen Herbert, and his executive staff. The job they have been doing is most commendable!

The nurses and staff have come through for us and performed above and beyond the call of duty. Residents' needs were still met, such as personal grooming, feedings when necessary and spending time with the lonely.

Staff saw to it that anyone coming into Baycrest was properly screened to protect our frailest residents.

We, the grateful residents of Baycrest, want to say thank you so very much to our incredible staff for leading us this far. It looks like we made it. We are "SARS free" at Baycrest!

It's despots versus democracy

The terrorists who, for years, have been waging war against the United States are being financed and abetted by those who most fear encroaching democracy – the despots of the world.

President George W. Bush instinctively understands that terrorists have been carefully nurtured by wealthy despots intent on warding off the march of democracy.

Clamping down on worldwide terrorist funding and making an example of Saddam Hussein were essential steps in his campaign against evil. America's plan to democratize Iraq will, hopefully, compel the despotic leaders of Iran, Syria and Saudi Arabia to move, for their own survival, towards eradicating the terrorists and the training camps dotting their landscapes. If they don't heed the warnings, democracy will continue its progressive march, ensuring their eradication and the emancipation of their peoples.

On campus, who else will speak up for us?

By LINDSAY SOBERANO

It was a May day and the Passover Massacre in Netanya had just occurred. There was a feeling of unease among the international Jewish community, and I could hear the familiar cliché, "They all hate us, they always have and they always will" being repeated over and over again in my mind.

I was sitting in a graduate English literature class. The course was "Modernism and Internationalism," and we had spent the year discussing globalization, cultural flows, World War I, World War II and universal individualism. We read texts such as Virginia Woolf's Voyage Out, E.M. Forster's A Passage to India, Joseph Conrad's Heart of Darkness and Gertrude Stein's Paris France.

But that day, we began with a discussion on censorship, a topic that evolved out of reading D.N. Rodowick's essay "Introduction: Mobile Citizens, Media States."

Rodowick suggests the Internet is responsible for fostering international relationships. But it also raises a question: what do you about the fact it also produces international relationships that jeopardize our democratic principles? What do you do with the people who use the Internet to foster hate?

The night before, I let my curiosity get the best of me and I entered derogatory words along with the word "Jew" into an Internet search engine. After scanning the results, I became enraged. How is this garbage allowed on the Internet? Surely something has to be done.

But my classmates didn't really think so. In fact, that day, several issues came up and whenever the topic turned to Israel or Jewishness, I felt as though it was "me" – as the only Jew in class – against "them."

Most of my classmates supported freedom of speech over censorship. The topic of censorship led to a debate about whether or not Mein Kampf or Holocaust denial should be censored. One student shared her disapproval about how Chapters does not sell Mein Kampf. She thought it was inappropriate and that anyone should be able to access it.

When it came to Holocaust denial, we spoke briefly about David Irving. One student believed there was nothing wrong with Holocaust denial. It should not be taught in schools, but it also should not be censored, the student said. And someone else threw in his two cents by suggesting people are able to discern between fact and fiction, so why hide the fiction?

As for me, I said Holocaust denial is dangerous and that it has no place in the world. What will the story be years from now if Holocaust denial keeps circulating? I picture a sort of broken telephone effect.

But that was not all for that class. The issue of Afghanistan was on the table and Barbara Walters had just aired a documentary in which she interviewed three young Afghan men. Two students in my class criticized Walters. One felt the documentary made Afghans look bad and that Walters had exoticized the country. One scene in particular that offended her was when Walters pointed out that anti-Semitism can be found in Afghani textbooks.

My classmate did not understand why Walters had to raise the issue. I did not raise my voice in class, because by that time, I felt like crawling into a hole, and I was wishing I had gone to university in Israel.

For the next few days, something was brewing inside me. I was uneasy and I knew that I had to give voice to my concerns. So I sent out a mass e-mail to my class explaining why I thought Holocaust denial was dangerous and how a lot of the propaganda the Nazis used in World War II was now being recycled in the Arab and Muslim worlds, and that, therefore, anti-Semitism was definitely worth being addressed by Walters.

What happened next really made me fly off my seat.

One student wrote that propaganda such as Holocaust denial is harmless, because propaganda did not even play a major role in World War II. I wondered how much these people really knew about the Holocaust? I wrote back explaining how propaganda had everything to do with the Nazis' efficiency and mass support. I began that e-mail with: "From some of the things that some of you are saying, I wonder just how much some of you know about the Holocaust."

I thought my comment was called for, but evidently one student did not, because she addressed a class e-mail to me that asked me who I thought I was and what made me such an expert and how dare I insult her intelligence.

I thought to myself, "I'm not an expert, but this is just something I feel inside of me." Maybe it's the fact my grandparents were Holocaust survivors and that I had just been to Dachau the previous summer. Maybe that was what made me identify so strongly with the issue that I could not stand for any ignorance.

In my e-mail, I apologized for unintentionally offending anyone, which caused my insulted classmate to send me a personal e-mail message about how her best friend when she was growing up was Jewish – yadda, yadda, yadda.

Finally, a classmate stood up for me and seemed to understand where I was coming from. She told my classmates to back off and not to be so offended, that I was only trying to help, and that it is natural that someone like me, from a family that contains Holocaust survivors, would take the issue to heart.

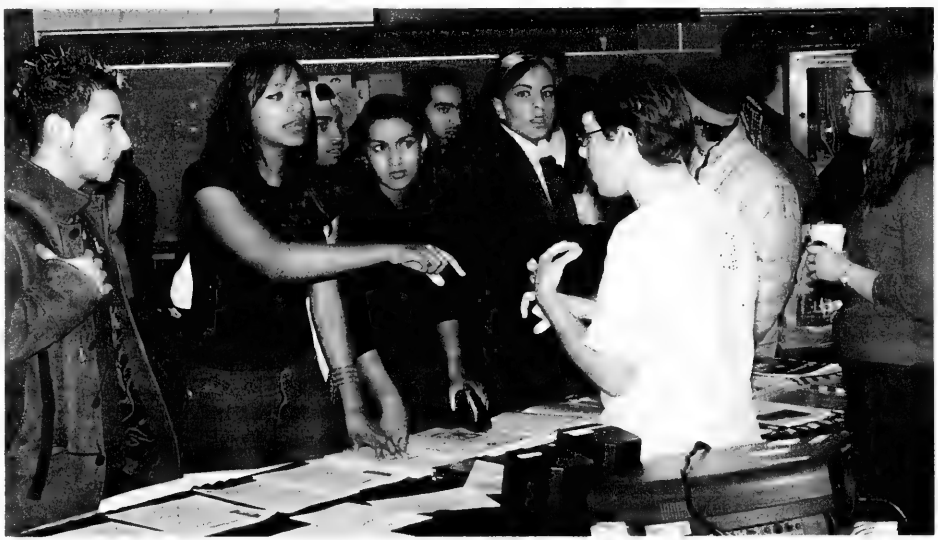
I then spoke to my independent studies professor, who was supervising my class in Canadian Jewish literature. He explained that anti-Israel and anti-American sentiment went together and that some students were just hopping on the bandwagon. He also said that leftist ideology is far too common on campus nowadays. And it is. Only this was the first time my eyes became open to it.

One year later, I look back on my experience with no guilt and no regrets. I did what every student should be doing on campus: I voiced my opinion.

Even though I now know that what I did was right, I remember how wrong I was made to feel at the time. No one should have to feel that way. No one should be forced to question whether or not he or she is right for speaking up. That's why it's so important to teach Jewish student activism and leadership skills at this time. It's obvious that it is not uncommon to be the only Jew in class and have to contend with opposing points of views.

If we do not help to educate our peers, who will? Who else will speak up for us? Who else can give our side of the story?

Lindsay Soberano is a graduate student in English at the University of Toronto.



The wall art (top) and student discussion (bottom), both from this past year at Carleton University, reflect the tension felt by students on many Canadian campuses.

Elie Wiesel's message in Washington

Elie Wiesel is the world's best known survivor of the Holocaust, for he has become the most eloquent interpreter of that horrible period in Jewish history.

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

He and I have been friends for many years, but our all-too-rare, in-person meetings are special events for us.

The most recent came when we met briefly at the final session of the Central Conference of American Rabbis in Washington, D.C., where he was the concluding speaker.

Wiesel, the winner of the 1986 Nobel Peace Prize and the author of such acclaimed books as Night and Dawn, speaks in soft tones. Yet, in his quiet way, he manages to give his words a special force.

He began his Washington address by describing the negative features of our time that affect the Jewish condition.

But while his analysis seemed to be based on a profound pessimism, his final conclusion was surprisingly positive. He summed it up in his final words: "There is hope."

It was a declaration that stood quite in contrast to his description of present reality, which he described in worrisome detail, and it most certainly was not the logical conclusion of a closely argued speech.

Instead, it was a statement of faith, and one with which I could thoroughly identify.

For him, as for me, Jewish history is unique: there is nothing in human history quite like it. It gives us plenty of reasons to be pessimists, yet we have not embraced that state of mind.

Instead, we are in tune with a well-known Hebrew expression: "Im kol kach," which means "despite all this," or, put more briefly, "even so."

Someone thus once described us as "im-kol-kachniks," which is an awkward term, but one that's not altogether inaccurate.

We Jews have often gone against the stream and have said "yes" when most others have said "no," and vice versa.

It has, in a way, become a Jewish characteristic, and Wiesel, in his thoughtful address, gave voice to it.

But he had another, related message to impart that day.

In his view, all Jews are, so to speak, survivors, and it behooves us to be aware of it. We are the recipients of a precious heritage, one that our predecessors all too frequently had to give their very lives to preserve.

They left us with the challenge to make our modern-day Judaism vibrant and meaningful.

Nothing less will do.

Lessons you can't learn in school

Over the last few weeks, I have found myself taking trips down memory lane a little more than usual.

As a graduating university student, I think that if I could do it all over again, there are so many things I would do differently.

When my classmates and I first made our entrance into university, many of us were still teenagers and very naïve about many things. We thought we would still stay friends with all of our high school buddies and that whatever relationships we were in at the time would last forever.

Barbara Balfour in Calgary

We thought that, one day, we would go off to New York to work for some glamorous law firm or to become an investment banker. But at some point – hopefully – we realized there's more to life than just making money, and that there are some ways of going about it that are more honourable than others.

Really, there's just so much out there that awaits us that they don't teach you about at school. Things you have to find out for yourself.

For me, some of the greatest lessons I've ever learned have been in the workplace.

One summer, I worked for the Edmonton Journal as a news reporter. During my first week there, my editor came running up to me with news of a huge fire that had engulfed a family-owned stable, and he instructed me to find out what happened.

I hopped into a cab that took me as close to the fire as possible, but the driver had to stop before reaching it because the smoke was so thick. I got out and thought to myself that if I couldn't walk straight to the stable, I would just walk around it.

So there I was, in my three-inch heels, stumbling over the rocky ground, trying not to step on horse manure, when I came to a barbed wire fence.

Could I turn around? No. I had to get a story, and my editor would be absolutely livid if I came back without it. So I took off my bag, my cellphone, my notebook, my tape recorder and my pen and threw them over the fence. Then, I climbed it – in my three-inch heels and short skirt, with 70-km/h winds whipping the hair around my face, clinging on for dear life, thinking, "When did I sign up for this?"

I had heard about risk management, but no one ever taught me about this in Business 101.

I eventually made it over the fence – without being electrocuted or impaled – and I found the family and got my story.

And I learned that where there is a will, there really is a way.

For those readers who may be graduating this year, if there is one pointer I could give you that might help you succeed later on in life, it would be to never accept the status quo. Question the rules. Break the rules.

A powerful story I once read left a similar impression on me. It's about the way the elephants you see in circuses and zoos are trained to stay in one place, so that they won't take off for the hills at the first opportunity.

The very first thing an elephant trainer teaches a young elephant is not to escape. When the elephant is just an infant, the trainer chains its leg to a huge log so that all attempts to flee prove to be futile and it gives up.

Eventually the elephant becomes so used to captivity that even when it grows big and strong, all the trainer has to do is tie the chain around its leg to a tiny twig. He knows it won't try to escape anymore.

The moral of the story is clear – don't be an elephant.

But the lesson is a little more profound than that.

At school, they always tell you to think outside the box, but you must remember that the box is only as big as the roof you choose to put on it. I truly believe there is so much out there awaiting all of us, and there is never a reason to put limits on ourselves or our dreams.

Reclaiming home

I am sitting down to write this column on the eve of my departure to Israel. It's funny, because even as I sit here with my bags packed, I cannot believe that I am leaving on a two-month journey that started off as a dreamlike idea in my head. While I articulated my desire and intent to travel to Israel many months ago, it is not without some surprise that I find myself actually ready to leave.

Joanna Grossman in Halifax

Many times over the past few weeks, since my arrival home in Toronto after a year of school in Halifax, I have been asked the popular question, "What are you doing this summer?"

My response – travelling and studying in Israel – has been met with everything from enthusiasm to many furrow-browed faces that seem to ask, "What are you thinking?" – a thought that is often accompanied by a sweet "Have a safe trip."

While I was originally secure in my conviction to go, the chorus of questions and doubts forced me to re-evaluate my intentions. Nevertheless, my decision remains firm.

The analysts of my choice fall into two categories. There are those who, having little knowledge of Israel beyond what they see in the news media, are shocked that anyone, let alone a rational and practical young woman, would decide to travel to a country ravaged by unpredictable terrorism.

Then there are those who have a more intimate relationship with the country – those who have lived or frequently travelled there, those who understand that the political climate of any given day, month or year should not preclude a journey home.

It is always hard to balance reason with emotion, to consider your desires and weigh their merits with some objectivity. In the past few weeks, as I have answered questions from family and friends, I have felt the burden of trying to find such a balance. There are times when "objectivity" loses meaning, when verbal arguments fail to help you understand something that is so inherently personal.

At an orientation meeting for participants on my Birthright Israel trip, a small exercise provided me with a bit of clarity. Groups of us were given cards, each with facets of Jewish life on them, and we were told to pick five aspects of Jewish life that we saw as essential to Jewish survival. Amid such things tradition, synagogue, Holocaust education and Jewish family, each group selected Israel as primary for Jewish survival.

Granted, this sentiment emerged from a group of students awaiting travel to Israel, but among this group of individuals, with different backgrounds and connections to Judaism, Israel was the common denominator. For these modern Jewish youth who had some knowledge of our long and arduous history, Israel is understood as the basis of Jewish survival.

At a recent family Shabbat dinner, my young cousin, a student at Bialik Hebrew Day School in Toronto, excitedly asked if I was going to Israel and said she wanted to go there too. That night, she and her sister collected pledges for the Yom Ha'atzmaut Walkathon.

The irony, though, didn't seem to register. We recognize the importance of supporting Israel, but for many, that support only extends so far. We look on with surprise as people persist in travelling to Israel, as Israel missions and programs such as Birthright continue, wondering why kids don't opt to backpack around Europe instead.

We seem to want to understand our irrevocable bond with Israel, but we aren't quite prepared to leave the safety of our own borders. We take for granted our own security and thus cannot fathom entering a situation that is anything but secure. We know that Israel's economy is depressed, that a lack of tourism is leaving people without food or basic necessities of life, but we rarely pay close attention to such problems, focusing on the "big picture" of political conflict.

Yet, I am not going to Israel to prove a point. I am going because it's what I want to do.

I do, however, think it is time that we refuse to allow our view of our homeland to be defined by politics and propaganda. When we see Israel solely as the site of political conflict, we forget what it means to us and our future.

The Kirshner File

Mitzna was the victim of a Labor party revolt

After less than six months at the helm of Israel's ailing Labor party, Amram Mitzna resigned abruptly on May 5, leaving it rudderless and in a state of disarray. No one was really surprised by his decision to step down.

Mitzna, the 58-year-old former mayor of Haifa, was hounded out of his position, politically henpecked to death by senior figures in the party who never accepted his leadership and cast grave doubts on his policies.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

In a bitter parting shot, Mitzna alluded to the infighting and intrigue that had tormented him and driven him out. He claimed that his enemies had "put their own personal interests before those of the party, and continuously harmed and sabotaged" him.

Elected party leader at a primary last November, following the resignation of his lacklustre predecessor, Binyamin Ben-Eliezer, Mitzna was a rank newcomer to national politics. Straightforward, solemn and forthright, much like the late prime minister Yitzhak Rabin, Mitzna gave the appearance of being a withdrawn person who lacked the back-slapping, flesh-pressing bonhomie and common touch of the typical politician. In the rough and tumble of Israeli politics, Mitzna's finest qualities – his honesty, integrity and guilelessness – were arrogantly equated with arch naivete.

But Mitzna, the fifth Labor party leader in eight years and the son of German immigrants who grew up in the Haifa suburb of Kiryat Haim, might have weathered these barbs had the party fared better in the last general election, held Jan. 28.

On that dismal day, Labor went down to ignominious defeat, having been crushed by the incumbent, Ariel Sharon, who pandered to the public's disillusionment with the Oslo peace process and its anger over the eruption of the second Palestinian uprising.

Mitzna's party, which dominated Israeli politics for almost the first 30 years of Israel's statehood, lost a quarter of its support, winning a meagre 19 seats in its worst-ever performance. Only a decade before, Rabin had trounced the Likud's stodgy candidate, former prime minister Yitzchak Shamir, as Labor coasted to an impressive victory.

A former army officer who rose to the rank of major general in a distinguished military career, Mitzna ran on a left-of-centre platform, calling for a renewal of bilateral negotiations with the Palestinian Authority.

Those talks broke off in January 2001, after Ehud Barak, the Labor prime minister, announced new elections. In the face of daily Palestinian violence, Sharon, the victor, did not resume negotiations.

By contrast, Mitzna offered the electorate a "bright and clear alternative" and the Palestinians a "political horizon." Mitzna's overriding goal was the immediate resumption of negotiations without preconditions. Echoing Rabin's catchy slogan, Mitzna declared that Israel "must fight terrorism as if there are no negotiations and negotiate as if there is no terrorism."

Promising to end the conflict with or without a formal agreement, Mitzna harped on the theme that peace is the key to Israel's wellbeing. "Despite the terror attacks," he said, "the only choice either side has is to return to the negotiating table."

Mitzna, who accused Sharon of leading Israel to disaster with his militaristic policies, was an admirer of the Oslo model. This did not necessarily please his colleagues. Barak, whose overtures were spurned by PA President Yasser Arafat at the Camp David summit in July 2000, cautioned Mitzna that he had drifted too far to the left and should draw the party closer to the centre. That advice was seconded by Ben-Eliezer.

Mitzna, however, was convinced that he could succeed where Barak had failed. And he believed that the Labor party had served as a fig leaf for Sharon's hawkish policies during the period of the unity government.

In outlining his views, Mitzna said he was prepared to resume talks at the point at which they had ended in Taba in 2001. Sharon vehemently opposed this strategy. Within this framework, Mitzna advocated separation – a unilateral withdrawal from the Gaza Strip and much of the West Bank if talks with the Palestinians floundered. Mitzna argued that Israel's re-occupation of the Palestinian autonomous areas, undertaken last spring after a spate of suicide bombings, was basically counterproductive.

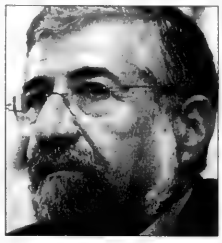
Like Rabin, but unlike Sharon, Mitzna thought that Jewish settlements in the territories were not in Israel's interests. As prime minister, he often said, he would immediately evacuate all settlements in Gaza and, eventually, a great many in the West Bank, resettling their residents inside Israel.

As for Jerusalem, Mitzna said he would keep only Jewish neighbourhoods.

Condemning Arafat as a "terrorist," Mitzna said he was "irrelevant." But in a sharp departure from Sharon's wholesale dismissal of Arafat, Mitzna concluded that Israel had no alternative but to regard him as an interlocutor. As he put it, "We must speak with whatever leadership the Palestinians choose."

But Mitzna's acceptance of Arafat as a partner was greeted with outright skepticism, if not hostility, in certain Labor circles. Shimon Peres, the foreign minister in Sharon's unity government, countered that Arafat was not reliable and that Israel should bypass him. Barak, who supported Ben-Eliezer in last November's party primary, warned that negotiations could not be resumed as long as Arafat played an executive role.

Mitzna predicted that his policies, which were endorsed by Palestinian leaders, would attract voters from the left and the centre. But he was dead wrong, having misjudged the public mood, which had shifted rightward since the dissolution of the Camp David summit and the eruption of the second intifadah.



Amram Mitzna

Yet Mitzna's abysmal showing in last January's election was not entirely his fault. Labor's participation in Sharon's government had, for all intents and purposes, blurred its identity, compromised its principles and alienated supporters, some of whom defected to Meretz, a party to the left of Labor.

It was not hard to understand why they were disappointed. Over Labor misgivings, Sharon gutted what was left of Oslo, Labor's baby. Sharon abandoned talks with the Palestinians, tolerated rogue settlements and re-occupied Palestinian towns.

Nevertheless, after the last election, Ben-Eliezer and others urged Mitzna to renew the alliance with Likud. Mitzna agreed to discuss the matter, but before his meeting with Sharon, he set out conditions: Israel would have to pull out of Gaza, relocate isolated settlements and disband illegal ones, channel funds away from settlements and finish the security fence along the length of the West Bank.

By all accounts, Mitzna emerged from the meeting in shock. Sharon – who has portrayed himself as a moderate, at least in comparison to his Likud rival Benjamin Netanyahu – subjected Mitzna to a didactic lecture on the strategic importance of settlements, such as Nitzarim and Hebron, that Mitzna considered expendable.

Apart from this disagreement, the chemistry between them left much to be desired. During the 1982 war in Lebanon, Mitzna temporarily resigned his commission after hearing that Sharon, the then-defence minister, had allowed Israel's Christian Lebanese allies into the Sabra and Shatila refugee camps, where they inflicted a massacre on their Palestinian occupants.

The abject failure of Mitzna's talks with Sharon had severe consequences. The Labor party was thereafter torn by mounting dissension over Mitzna's policies and leadership style. The acrimonious situation was exacerbated by newspaper stories suggesting that Mitzna was reconsidering his future and that the majority of Labor Knesset members were disenchanted with him.

Tensions reached newer heights in mid-March when Ben-Eliezer released a plan, adopted by the party, ruling out unilateral measures, from a withdrawal from Gaza to the dismantlement of outlying settlements.

Mitzna's increasingly precarious hold on power was loosened still more when Barak again accused Mitzna of "dragging" the party too far to the left.

In the days prior to Mitzna's resignation, the rhetoric escalated as two former cabinet ministers cast aspersions on him. Excoriating him with faint praise, Haim Ramon said that, while Mitzna was "a serious, good and responsible person," he was essentially unfit to lead the party. Matan Vilnai disclosed he would challenge Mitzna for the leadership.

Mindful of the brewing revolt, Mitzna preempted his critics by resigning. But in a show of defiance, he defended his policies.

Peres, who has the dubious distinction of never having won an election and who has never hesitated to pursue the perks of office, lobbied strenuously to succeed Mitzna. But this was not to be.

Dalia Itzik, the former minister of trade and industry, was chosen last week to replace Mitzna on an interim basis. A new leader will be elected in July.

But it is doubtful whether even a relatively fresh face can reinvigorate the creaking and decrepit Labor party.

A Guiding Hand

Associated Hebrew Schools of Toronto

As children enter adolescence, their lives become more complex. While children usually resolve issues with the help of a teacher, there are times when adolescents require the trusting relationship of a guidance counselor. The Middle School Guidance Department addresses the social, emotional and academic needs of students. Our open door policy ensures that each student can speak to a counselor privately on any topic. In the classroom setting, counselors teach organizational skills, test-taking strategies, and emotional coping skills. Academic remediation is provided to students who need it. Guidance counselors are a vital link between teachers, students and parents, and help our children succeed.

Jerusalem chief rabbi mourned

By RABBI YEHIEL BEN AYON

The election of the two new chief rabbis of Israel on the days prior to Pesach did not overshadow the news of the passing of the chief Sephardi rabbi of Jerusalem.

Rabbi Chalom Messas passed away on Shabbat Hagadol. Rabbi Messas had held this post for the last 25 years. Prior to that, he was the chief rabbi of Morocco, and prior to that, the chief rabbi of Casablanca, a posting he had at the relatively young age of 36.

Rabbi Messas was a child prodigy, a student of the fabled Rebbi Yeshua Berdugo and a prolific author. In his many books, Rabbi Messas expressed staunch support for North African customs (minhag Magreb).

When I was received at his home in Jerusalem, I remember his admonishment to me: never veer from the rulings of the Shulchan Aruch. Rabbi Messas would nevertheless defend the prevalent customs even if they did not reflect the precise meaning of the Shulchan Aruch. He considered one of his life's most important tasks the publishing of manuscripts and out-of-print works of Moroccan interest.

There are in the world today over half a million Jews of Moroccan descent, making them the single largest sub-group of Jewry worldwide. In the past 50 years, the Moroccan community has made a major migration. Rabbi Messas presided during the glorious days of the community, watched its numbers dwindle and eventually rejoined them in Jerusalem.

In 1978, Rabbi Ovadiah Yosef invited Rabbi Messas to head the newly vacant position of Jerusalem's Chief Rabbinate. Not wanting to desert a sinking ship, Rabbi Messas deferred his decision to the Lubavitcher Rebbe of blessed memory. The Rebbe responded by congratulating Rabbi Messas on this new posting.

His departure, however was not that simple. Rabbi Messas, as an employee of the monarch, tactfully requested the king's permission to "retire" in Israel. The king acquiesced, saying he understood his wishes to be the rabbi of Al Quds.

On the last days before his departure, the Messas home was busy with many a courtesy call from all levels of government, community, mosque and church.

On the actual day of his departure, a large contingent gathered to sadly bid him farewell. In the midst of this event, the royal motorcade, with motorcycles, national flags and the king's personal insignia, pulled up to Rabbi Messas's home. A touching honour, everyone thought. The king was sending his personal vehicles to take the Messas family to the airport. And then silence spread as his royal majesty, King Hassan, himself came out of the sedan. The king rode with Rabbi Messas to the airport, and there asked him for his blessing for that last time on Moroccan soil.

This was a moment of historical proportions, for it captured the conclusion of the Jewish Moroccan Diaspora. Here was a king allowing a people to go, not only with his blessings, but indeed requesting theirs. A people whose presence on this land preceded that of the king's own Alaouite dynasty.

The history of the Jews in Morocco, with a few exceptions, was by and large tranquil. Today, the Jews of Morocco, unlike most other Jews of Arab lands, bear their Moroccan heritage with pride and speak warmly of their monarch. When we choose to recall the blessings of the memory of Rabbi Chalom Messas, his gentleness, his piety, scholarship and leadership, part of that memory encompasses the realization that a glorious era has ended.

A triple-decker family history

By ZE'EV GLICENSTEIN

What does it take to produce a three-volume family history that extends to nearly 900 pages?

In the case of Mildred Wyman, who recently self-published a triple-decker family history titled A Forest of Trees, it has taken eight years of intensive research and writing, dozens of taped interviews with relatives, and the editorial discipline to trim many extraneous stories from the finished project to prevent it from filling four, five or even six volumes.

"I cut out an awful lot because I was afraid it was impeding the flow," admits Wyman, a Torontonian who was born here 85 years ago this month and who has always had a strong interest in family history.

"I have a very great need to know. I was always listening when my relatives told stories. I was a source of irritation to them because I always asked questions. My children and grandchildren didn't want to hear these stories any more, but I felt they had to hear them to know who they are. I wanted them to have the feeling that they came from somewhere."

She began the project after her husband Max Wyman, a leather-goods manufacturer, died in 1994. With the intrepid instincts of a novice, she began embellishing the plain facts in ways that historians aren't supposed to do, inventing scenes, dialogue and novelistic crescendos of feeling for many of her long-dead ancestors and relatives. The results seemed to resemble fiction as much as non-fiction.

Her writing hand was guided by the stories she'd heard countless times from her mother and uncles, she says, adding that she replayed tapes of interviews with relatives until their voices and tales became as familiar to her as her own.

"I have to say in all honesty that I had to twist scenes and dialogue, but what I said happened really happened," she explains, the way a novelist will admit to telling little lies in order to convey a bigger truth.

A professional writer who saw her manuscript told her she was writing social history, not a novel, and encouraged her to continue. If so, she had also unwittingly stumbled upon "creative non-fiction," an emerging genre that authors such as Elaine Kalman Naves and Nomi Eve have employed to such good effect in Journey to Vaja and The Family Orchard, respectively.

But Wyman wisely recognized the limited commercial appeal of her own opus and published only 100 sets, mostly for family members.

Roughly speaking, Volume I tells the story of her family, the Zabazinskys, from their experiences in 19th-century Vitebsk to their arrival in Canada in 1907; Volume II traces her husband's family, the Sachs, from southern Russia to New York's Lower East Side and then to Toronto; and Volume III begins after the two families come together after her marriage in 1950.

The book's appeal is broadened with its accounts of local Jewish history, such as the Christie Pits riot and the pro-Nazi gangs in the Beaches. Wyman also tells of her Cabbagetown upbringing and her experiences as proprietor of Wyman's Variety Store, opposite Harbord Collegiate. But it's clear that A Forest of Trees, which lacks even an index of surnames to guide strangers through its sometimes dense undergrowth, is intended primarily as a family keepsake.

Now that the work is published – Wyman is scheduled to read from it at Israel's Judaica on June 11 and at the Toronto Jewish Book Fair in November – does she have any other writing projects planned?

"I used to say 'Not on your life,'" she laughs. "But now I'm beginning to feel an itch."

Jewish commitment in different worlds

Saving the Lost Tribe: The Rescue and Redemption of the Ethiopian Jews*, by Asher Naim, Random House, $39.95.

Jews have lived in Ethiopia for nearly 3,000 years. They were called by others Falashas ("strangers or outsiders" in Ge'ez, a Semitic language once spoken in ancient Abyssinia), and by themselves Beta Israel (in Ge'ez, "House of Israel"). They were cut off from mainstream Judaism for many centuries but maintained their faith despite drought, famine and tribal war.

Their religion is based on the Torah in Ge'ez translation. They do not, however, possess the Oral Law and know nothing of talmudic teachings.

Before 1948, about 8,000 Ethiopian Jews immigrated to Israel. In 1984, an additional 8,000 of them, mainly from the Gondar area, were airlifted to Israel from the Sudan.

In May 1991, with their country exploding around them in a brutal civil war, some 14,000 of these black Jews were safely airlifted to Jerusalem by the Israeli Air force over the course of 25 hours. This astonishing rescue operation is here related in all of its exciting and vivid detail by the then-Israeli ambassador to Ethiopia. This is the first English language book on Operation Solomon by an insider. The complex rescue involved the co-operation of the Israeli government, negotiations with Ethiopia's savage dictator and the frantic raising of millions of dollars from American sources.

This account is more a personal memoir than a detailed history, and it is infused with compassion and affection for a long-suffering but courageous and devoted people.

When the United Nations passed its infamous resolution that equated Zionism with racism, the author pointed out to a UN committee that for "centuries, black Africans had been taken from the continent in shackles on slave ships. Now, for the first time in African history, black Africans left Africa for freedom. In Israel, they were received as a lost tribe that had returned home."

He continued, "Therefore, Mr. Chairman, UN Resolution 3374 that equates Zionism with racism is a lie, preposterous and unjustified, and I call on it to be repealed for the sake of the United Nations' honour, and for truth and justice."

A vote of 111 countries for and 25 against repealed Resolution 3374. It was the first – and the only – UN resolution ever to be repealed.

This is an absorbing and inspiring work that chronicles hope and redemption in the face of chaos and despair.

Different Horizons*, by Joseph L. Applebaum, $14.95 (paperbound).

Born in 1933 to the only Jewish family in the village of Lancaster, Ont., amiable Joseph Applebaum had no difficulty in making and keeping friends.

He became a bar mitzvah in nearby Montreal, and left school in Grade 10 (years later he graduated from Concordia University) in order to enlist in the Canadian army. After a brief training course in Japan, he saw action in Korea. Broadened and matured by his three years of army service, he remained dedicated, through the years, to the military ideal.

In this unpretentious memoir the author comes across as optimistic, devoted to his family, hard-working, patriotic and a proud and committed Jew. Especially noteworthy are his strongly held opinions on a variety of topics: Canadian politics and politicians, Swiss anti-Semitism, Quebec separation and Jewish-Christian relations.

On the question of Quebec language laws he writes, "To penalize a group of people in Quebec that have lived there for over 200 years by telling them where their language is to be used and where not, seems to be worse than dictatorial indiscretion since it is outright evil and will eventually return to haunt those that brought these laws about."

The author awaits the time when the "transition from preaching religion as it is, to teaching religion as a means of understanding life, its rewards, its benefits and its downside will be the real turning point for mankind."

This honest and many-sided life story is available in Jewish book stores in Toronto, Montreal and western Canada.

Summer camps & the Net

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

May is here, and in a few short weeks students will close their schoolbooks and transform into campers piling into Jewish camps across North America. For parents (and kids) gearing up for summer camp, the Internet is a marvelous resource for facts and tips. But even for families whose camping days are long gone, the World Wide Web is also the repository of wonderful summertime recollections. Today, Jewish camp facts and memories.

How do you know if the camp you are considering will be right for your child? The Association of Jewish Sponsored Camps has surveyed its 26 affiliated camps. You can check its Web site for information about such matters as Jewish ritual observance, emphasis on sports and arts and staffing ratios. [http://www.jewishcamps.org/y_camp.asp]

Check out Moment magazine for more camp listings. [http://www.momentmag.com/resources/campguide.html] There are plenty of "Jewish camps" out there and the differences between them can be quite significant. Steve Eller, director of Maryland's Beth Tfiloh Camps says there are seven key aspects to look out for when choosing a Jewish camp:

- general programming
- special programming
- staffing
- dietary considerations
- Hebrew language
- Israeli culture
- campers themselves

As for the Beth Tfiloh camps, while they hold Shabbat services and are "kosher-style," executive director Ed Cohen says parents who want their children to have a strong Jewish camping experience should send their kids elsewhere. [http://www.jewz.com/alef/whats_jewish_camp.phtml]

The Cleveland Jewish News has a wonderful summer camp resource. Its Web site has articles about choosing the right camp, countering cliques at camp, bully-proofing your child at camp and a counsellor's ten commandments for creating a safe and fun environment at camp. [http://www.clevelandjewishnews.com/special/camp]

For kids lucky enough to get away for the summer, it's not unusual to find summer camps that specialize in waterfront activities or drama or even computers. But this summer, a new Jewish camp is focusing on Jewish genealogy. Forty 11th- and 12th-graders will participate in two two-week sessions run by the Center for Jewish History and the American Jewish Historical Society. They'll learn about Jewish immigration to America, how to conduct genealogical research and create a project about their own family history. [http://www.cjh.org/family/samberg.cfm]

When Rob Dixter went off to Jewish camp at the age of 11, he wasn't preoccupied with genealogy or swimming or even baseball. Rob set his sights much higher. He wanted to meet his future wife while at camp – just like dad did. So for Rob, it became the summer of Mindy. "Mindy Vanksberg, I said. Mindy Vanksberg. Mindy Vanksberg. I thought if I said her name three times it might help me to get over the shock that a nice Jewish girl thought I was cute." To find out if Mindy was Rob's bashert, read his article at GenerationJ.com. [http://www.generationj.com/archive/relationships/camp.html]

For other camp reminiscences, look at the entries at the Camp Kewanee Memories Web site. Camp Kewanee was located in Parksville in New York's Catskill mountains. The camp may no longer exist, but it has left a wonderful impression on a generation of campers. [http://www.geocities.com/campkewanee/memories.html]

Camp is not only a time for kids to build memories, it's also a time for parents to let loose. But as Pearl Salkin found out, parents usually end up downgrading your dreams. [http://makeashorterlink.com/?A32822C54] "I did get the chance to do some daring deeds – I added two easy-listening stations to my car radio's presets, and I served chopped liver as an appetizer one night, acts that would have elicited condemnation from the kids. And I went into my recipe file and put together some grown-up menus. But after investing all those hours preparing a special dinner for my husband and then watching him wolf it down in record time, I decided we'd eat out or order in pizza until the kids came home.

"The three weeks Will was away flew by. When he returned home from camp, he seemed older; while he was away, my husband and I seemed younger. You can't put a price on that."

Working for the rights of all Israelis

In response to Gerald Steinberg's May 8 CJN column, in which he criticized the New Israel Fund for its involvement with groups that he says support human and civil rights but also promote the delegitimization of Israel, the NIF submitted the following article.

By YORAM PERI

The past 2½ years have been a challenging time for Israel and for all of us who care deeply about the country, its security and its democracy. It is a time when Jews all around the world – in Israel, and abroad in Canada, Europe, the United States and elsewhere – are united in our deep concern for the future and fate of our families, friends and the State of Israel itself.

In my role with the NIF, and together with my Israeli colleagues on the board, I have worked hard to ensure that, even at this difficult moment, we focus on the immediate issue of Israel's security and on the more difficult question of what kind of Israel will survive when this current crisis has passed.

The New Israel Fund's mission is to strengthen Israel's democracy and to ensure that it is a state based on values fundamental to Judaism and democracy: justice, freedom and equality. We take our inspiration directly from Israel's Declaration of Independence, which says, "The State of Israel… will ensure complete equality of social and political rights to all its inhabitants irrespective of religion, race or sex."

We believe deeply in a strong Israel, but we also believe that Israel's strength derives not only from its ability to defend itself militarily but also from its commitment to democratic values. To us, even at a time when Israel is fighting for its security, it must maintain its fundamental commitment to democratic principles if it is to fulfil the vision of its founders and its prophets.

Israel can be neither a democracy nor a true Jewish homeland if it denies a minority of its citizens their rights on the basis of their ethnicity. For centuries, that was the fate of the Jewish people themselves as they faced laws banning land ownership in Europe or under Czarist regimes in Russia. It was precisely to escape such racism and discrimination that Jews began to return to Palestine in the late 19th century.

Unfortunately, for 54 years, this country has done at best a poor job of providing those minority citizens with equal or remotely equal services and benefits. To better understand, one simply has to visit an Arab Israeli school that receives one-third of the funding of a Jewish school, or the unrecognized Bedouin villages in the Negev that function without sewers or electricity, let alone schools and health clinics. Or review the national development budget, which consistently allocates to Arab citizens four per cent of each shekel spent on a Jewish citizen.

For 24 years, NIF has been the premier philanthropic organization promoting equality, fairness and justice for all of Israel's citizens, especially those populations that have traditionally been at a disadvantage: Arabs, women, children, Mizrachim, new immigrants and non-Orthodox Jews. With our help, a thriving non-profit sector advocates today for the rights of many facing discrimination in Israel, from new immigrants to the disabled to the underprivileged seeking a road out of poverty to communities in need, such as battered women and rape victims.

NIF is dedicated to reversing years of discrimination and mistreatment of the Arab minority in Israel. Our work is always positive and directed toward the realization of shared aspirations of justice, and motivated by the belief that not only is it the morally right thing to do, it is in our self-interest. A healthy democracy that treats all its citizens fairly and equally is the surest way to ensure the long-run strength of the Jewish homeland in Israel. And that is a goal I know we all share as Jews – here in Israel and in North America as well.

Yoram Peri is immediate past president of the New Israel Fund and chair of its international council. He also heads the Herzog Institute for Media, Politics and Society at Tel Aviv University.

Author Coloroso to speak about what bullying is

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

At what point does schoolyard teasing turn into taunting? When do bullied kids become victims? And why do innocent bystanders become willing accomplices?

Barbara Coloroso, educator and author of the bestseller Kids Are Worth It, argues that when bullying is ignored by parents and teachers, a cycle of violence is tolerated that can have long-term effects on an entire school population.

Barbara Coloroso

Coloroso, who writes a monthly column for the Globe and Mail titled Family Matters, has recently published a book called The Bully, the Bullied and the Bystander. She will discuss teenage bullying – what it is and what it isn't, as well as issues relating to her latest book, at a community wide non-denominational event on Wednesday, June 4, at Beth Tzedec Congregation at 8 p.m.

Bullying in schoolyards occurs once every seven minutes and can be physical, verbal or psychological, varying from direct and face to face to indirect in the form of gossip, according to a York University research project conducted by the LaMarsh Centre for Research on Violence and Conflict Resolution.

Children who learn "to acquire power through aggression on the playground," can transfer those skills into their lives as adults. In extreme cases, it can lead to cases of "sexual harassment, date violence, gang attacks, as well as marital, child and elder abuse," write Canadian professors Debra Pepler and Wendy Craig.

"Jewish day schools are not immune from the cycle of violence that affects other communities," Coloroso said in a phone interview.

"Any school that supports a sense of entitlement, the liberty to exclude and an intolerance to differences is fertile soil for bullying," she said.

Last year, a 13-year-old student at an American Jewish day school was severely beaten by five children at a sleepover party. When the bullying continued in the school, the parents of the bullied child filed charges against the bullies.

Coloroso said that eventually one child was expelled and one left the school. However, "the problem was never dealt with in an effective manner and longterm changes never took place.

"Private schools have an illusion that these things don't happen to them because their children are different," the noted parenting expert said.

> 'Any school that supports a sense of entitlement, the liberty to exclude and an intolerance to differences is fertile soil for bullying'

However, her research indicates that children in private schools experience the same types of issues as do those in the public sector. The only difference is that "private schools feel they have a reputation to maintain and usually ask a targeted child to leave."

That doesn't solve anything because the cycle of violence continues and no one changes, Coloroso said.

Zero tolerance rules currently in place in schools are "zero thinking policies," Coloroso said.

"Such policies are about efficiency and finding fault, not about effective solutions for breaking the cycle of violence. What needs to be found is a social solution to this antisocial activity," she writes in her book.

Coloroso told The CJN that she believes in the importance of giving students, teachers and parents a common language to understand the difference between very strong assertive behaviour as opposed to aggressive conduct.

Teachers need to be aware of what bullying is and what it isn't and they need to learn to "never look away," she said.

When bullying occurs, schools need to implement anti-bullying procedures that allow the bullies and the bullied to meet, when they are ready, to resolve the problem together, Coloroso said. In addition, education programs need to be implemented that deal effectively with those children who simply stand by and watch.

"The benefits of teaching witnesses and bystanders to act with integrity when the burden is heavy" is clear. Giving the silent majority the tools to stand up to bullies teaches children to implement leadership skills they already have. In the end, schools raise caring, decent human beings, she said.

The event at Beth Tzedec is being hosted by the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto. Tickets are $25. Book signings will take place before and after the event. For further information call 416-636-5984, ext. 350.

"I've now lost the weight PERMANENTLY"

Hi. My name is Pierrette Daoust. I am a French teacher for the City of Toronto.

In February 2001 I walked into the Positive Changes office feeling uncomfortable and desperate about my weight gain. I wanted to lose weight permanently. It was the third time in my life that I was struggling with excess weight due to poor stress management techniques when facing difficult situations in family or at work.

The other two times, I joined Weight Watchers. I was successful at losing the weight, but I could not live measuring my food and counting calories for the rest of my life.

I lost 70 pounds in 30 weeks. I was 198 pounds when I started. I lost a steady 3 pounds a week for the first 20 weeks, then 1 to 2 pounds a week for the next 8 – 10 weeks. I now weigh 128 pounds and am easily maintaining that weight.

BEFORE

AFTER

Positive Changes has taught me how to convert my eating habits and to make it a permanent part of my lifestyle so that I can effortlessly return to my natural ideal weight and maintain that weight.

If you're looking for ways to empower your life or to lose some unwanted weight, reduce stress and improve your lifestyle, do consider getting some support from Positive Changes. My time spent there has been a great power of support for me.

Adath Israel Synagogue celebrates its centennial

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

The Romanian immigrants who founded the small community of worshippers that would become Adath Israel Congregation probably never envisioned that membership would some day grow to 1,800 families, let alone that the synagogue would make its home in what was then countryside or that members would give up their Orthodox services and join the Conservative movement.

On June 22, Adath Israel will wrap up its centennial year with a gala boat cruise dinner. Other celebratory events over the past year included a lecture series that will conclude June 9 with Globe and Mail columnist Margaret Wente, a cantorial concert attended by more than 1,200 people in November, youth programs and holiday events. Shabbat services May 31 will feature a children's choir reunion.

Among the artifacts collected and sorted by John Zeiler, centennial chair and a past congregational president, was a souvenir program from the First Roumanian Hebrew Congregation Adath Israel of Toronto's sixth annual bazaar in 1930.

"This is priceless," he said. "I just think that all of this is fascinating stuff." Even minute books recording the congregation's pre-World War I meetings survived, written in tidy Yiddish script.

Lifelong member Bea Solomon, secretarial assistant to Rabbi Erwin Schild, the synagogue's rabbi emeritus, has a family connection with Adath Israel dating back to her father's arrival in Canada almost exactly 100 years ago.

Max Wainberg, Solomon's father, "made sure as soon as he came that he met the few immigrants who were Romanian," she told The CJN.

"They used to meet [for services] in a room over a Turkish bath. He was very proud that he was part of it, and of course the most important thing was to establish a synagogue, so that whoever was here would be able to worship together and that the families stay together."

Over the years, said Solomon, the social aspect, along with worship, has meant a great deal to her close and extended family.

Zeiler said members rented their own premises for the first time in 1903 "after a painful process of collecting nickels and dimes."

After a few moves, they were able to buy two "cottages" on Centre Avenue, moving in 1911 to south Bathurst Street, home of the "Roumanishe shul," as it was commonly known, until the 1950s. Its first full-time spiritual leader was Rabbi Abraham Kelman, the congregation's first full-time spiritual leader and the older brother of Rabbi Joseph Kelman, rabbi emeritus of Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue

Solomon recalls childhood walks to the synagogue with her father, a merchant, and her participation in the congregation's first youth group in the 1930s.

She and her late husband Sam – whose father Abe was a life trustee of the synagogue – were married there in 1939. They met at a Ladies' Auxiliary bazaar when Bea was 12.

"I remember my mother baking, crocheting and selling items at the bazaars, and we as kids would help her. I would say the women played a tremendous role in raising money in order to build a beautiful synagogue. The biggest challenge then was the number of people. There were just a handful."

Even in 1956, when the congregation moved to its present location on Southbourne Avenue near Bathurst Street and Wilson Avenue, there were only 180 member families.

The following year, the synagogue became Conservative. "There was no opposition to that at all," recalled Rabbi Schild, "although there was some opposition to changing the name to just Adath Israel."

The move to Conservative Judaism reflected members' lack of adherence to Orthodox observance. In fact, when Rabbi Schild became spiritual leader in 1947, succeeding Rabbi Kelman, the congregation paid people to make up the daily minyan.

According to Rabbi Schild, the biggest change over the years has been from an "inward-looking" congregation to a community-minded one, with members who have become local Jewish community leaders.

Rabbi Steven Saltzman, who took over as spiritual leader in 1989 when Rabbi Schild retired, said Adath Israel is a "traditional Conservative congregation committed to bringing our membership an authentic experience of Judaism based on the laws and teachings of our people.

"We do a full traditional service…We really do try and care for our membership and forge a community based on that caring, without compromising what we believe in."

Adath Israel's president, Mark E. Alter, 51, served as organizer of the shul's Sunday morning tfillin club for post-bar mitzvah boys as a teenager in the 1960s, and became involved again after he was married in the '70s.

The synagogue "seems to have carved out a niche" in the traditional Conservative community, he said. "We have a number of arms of the synagogue which are very active in keeping our programming at a very high level, and in keeping our services inspiring. I hope that it continues for another 100 years."

AGRICULTURAL, FOOD AND ENVIRONMENTAL (DRIP IRRIGATION PROJECT)

The Hebrew University of Jerusalem researchers have made discoveries of major significance, including a new drug for the treatment of Alzheimer's disease and dementia; drip irrigation to increase food-crop production while decreasing water consumption; an anti-cancer drug with an innovative delivery system, and much more.

The Israel government's need to divert funding to defense is exacting a costly toll in budget cuts to the University.

Without your financial support, we will not be able to provide our researchers with state-of-the-art equipment and essential research tools, and many of our research projects could be lost.

INVEST IN A BETTER TOMORROW . TODAY!

Honouring the legacy of Rabbi Kirshenblatt

By RABBI AARON FLANZRAICH

Guest Voice

We have many common expressions that try to capture the essence of life. We say, "Life's a journey, travel light" and "Life is a journey, enjoy the ride." These phrases are ingrained in our culture and thought because we see and hear them frequently in newspapers and on television.

I agree that life is a journey. But in order to enjoy it, you don't have to travel light, and it's okay if the ride is a bit bumpy.

As spiritual leader of Beth Sholom Synagogue, it is my good fortune to be here because of the remarkable people who preceded me. One such man, Rabbi Jacob Mendel Kirshenblatt, died last year. The ember of his legacy is still very much felt here, in the chambers of our wonderful building and in the hearts and minds of many Canadians, because few who met this special man were left untouched.

Rabbi Kirshenblatt was born April 27, 1903, in the Polish town of Driltsh, the son of Golda and Zalman. His childhood had all of the markings of a traditional Polish Jewish life, but at age 16 it took a remarkable turn. He entered the Yeshiva of Lomza and continued his studies with the renowned European rabbinic great the "Chofetz Chaim" – Rabbi Meir Israel Kagan – at his yeshiva in Radun, Poland.

Wishing to complete his rabbinic studies, a young Mendel Kirshenblatt left for what was then Palestine and the newly established branch of the Lomza Yeshiva in Petach Tikvah. With little money, inadequate documents and faked identity cards, but with complete faith that God would bring him to where he wished to go, Mendel Kirshenblatt did indeed arrive. In 1929, 4 years after he left his native Poland, he became, at 26, Rabbi Jacob Mendel Kirshenblatt, and the world would soon become richer for it.

After contacting a brother in Toronto, he received a position in Welland, Ont. The following year, he met and married his wife Annie and became the rabbi of Glace Bay and Cape Breton Island in Nova Scotia, where he served for nine years. During World War II, he served as a volunteer chaplain and met Rabbi David Monson, the founding rabbi of Beth Sholom.

After the war, and a small stint in Peterborough, Ont., Rabbi Kirshenblatt joined Rabbi Monson in the task of building a great Conservative shul in Toronto, what became Beth Sholom Synagogue. Their partnership was extraordinary. It was also uniquely Canadian – each of them had travelled throughout the country and abroad, and they both understood the remarkable diversity and needs of small and large Canadian communities.

This is the timeline of Rabbi Kirshenblatt's life, but it's not the reality of his life.

Raised and educated in Europe, ordained in Israel and having served his people with distinction in Canada, Rabbi Kirshenblatt's life story is the story of our people. He overcame immense obstacles and became a success because he never wandered from life's truest values.

How many were touched by him? How many were taught by him?

How many children who were considered "unreachable" arrived at his door, only to be reached at and taught? How did he do this? Not through divination. He did it with love.

Indeed, Rabbi Kirshenblatt had a well-earned reputation for being able to teach children their bar and bat mitzvah portions. In fact, he had taught many generations of the same families and he continued to teach children until shortly before his death. But he showed his real genius with children who were termed "problems" or "rebels." Armed with love, humility, scholarship, respect and care, Rabbi Kirshenblatt, or "Kirshy" as his many former students today still lovingly refer to him, won them all over. Few, if any, could stand up to an assault from this man's humanity.

Rabbi Kirshenblatt was trained in an old world rabbinic way, which was very uncommon in the realm of the "modern" North American rabbinate. He was a shochet (ritual slaughterer), a mohel, a ba'al koreh (Torah reader), a teacher and a bit of a chazzan to boot. He was also a legitimate scholar in his own right, having studied at the feet of some of the giants of European Jewry.

Beth Sholom to hold special ceremony on June 1

In a colloquial way, we might have referred to Rabbi Kirshenblatt as a "kol bo," meaning "all within." Such a moniker denotes a man of letters and experience, a man who can speak the word and law, and at the same time act on it. Need a brit milah? He could do it. Short of kosher meat? Not to worry, he could look after that, too. No one to read the Torah this Shabbat? He would do it. And on it went, as his skills and heart were able to match whatever demands were placed on them.

Luckily for us all, no matter how long Rabbi Kirshenblatt lived in our contemporary world, the real world of his faith, traditions, and scholarship kept him firmly where he was needed most.

June 1 at noon, we at Beth Sholom will honour his memory with an unveiling ceremony at his monument. The community is invited to attend to honour a future strengthened by his legacy.

Rabbi Flanzraich is spiritual leader of Beth Sholom Synagogue in Toronto.

Toronto couple reflects on Pesach in Israel

The Herczegs are Toronto residents who have long been active in Toronto's Jewish community. They are passionate about spending Pesach in Israel and wanted to share their experience with Jewish Toronto.
By Agnes and George Herczeg

We travel to Israel yearly, usually in April or May, because it is the nicest time of the year to enjoy the beauty of the country, the weather is most pleasant, and we are still able to leave the last bit of Canadian winter behind.

We think of Israel as the greatest achievement of the Jewish people in modern times. Coming from Europe, we understand the extraordinary meaning of the existence of a Jewish state, where people are first-class citizens in their own country and not simply a tolerated minority.

So, in spite of quiet disapproval from our friends, once again we left for Israel this year, as is the norm, during Hol Hamoed Pesach.

To our surprise, the plane was about 80% full. We found the arrival hall at Ben Gurion airport busy and bustling. We weren't exactly sure where everyone was coming from, but it made us feel good to see there were others who did not want to abandon this special country.

Our pre-arranged taxi driver was waiting for us outside with a nice smile and a big baruch haba.

It was late afternoon, the sun was shining gently and there was a lovely fresh breeze. The road was lined with beautiful palm trees, colourful spring flowers and plenty of traffic. As we exited the airport grounds, we noticed a shiny stone building under construction and were informed that it was the new terminal being built to connect train transportation from the city (and the rest of the country) to the airport. With all the difficulties facing this country, and with all that they are coping with here, there is still foresight for such growth. Amazing.

On our familiar ride north to Haifa, we noticed housing which wasn't there last year, complete with cheerful white stucco and red roof tiles surrounded by new trees.

Our taxi driver – an Iraqi Jew, asked us where we were from and when we said we said we were from Toronto, he asked how many Jews lived in Toronto When we answered: 'nearly 200,000' he seemed quite shocked. "Why don't they come here?" he asked. Whether he meant to visit or to immigrate, we weren't really sure, but he said it with a sincere naivete. All we could answer was: 'It's really hard to explain.'

Looking out of the taxi again on the left, the sun over the Mediterranean was just hitting the water and everything started to glow. What a beautiful sight.

Four generations of Chilean family make aliyah together

Maria Argushi, a 71-year-old native of Chile, moved to Israel recently with 28 other members of her family, including her seven children, 14 grandchildren, and four-month old great-grandson. All are currently in the good hands of the Jewish Agency for Israel's (JAFI) Tapuz Absorption Centre in Nahariya. A son and a daughter remained behind, but the family hopes that the stories from Israel will convince them to join the kinfolk.

The Argushi family pose in front of Israel's Tapuz Absorption Centre after making aliyah.

"Our large family from the city of Conception in Southern Chile was always very careful to lead a strict Jewish life," says Maria. "We have dreamed of coming to Israel our entire lives." For many years Maria's dream was put on the back burner after several of her brothers tried to get to Israel through Argentina, but a few succumbed to the hardships of the trek and died trying to cross the Andes Mountains. The others reached Buenos Aires, but never managed to get to Israel.

The newcomers are now beginning to explore Israel; last week they strolled along the beach in Nahariya. "The most amazing thing about Israel is the security," says Maria's son, Javier Torres. "In Chile everyone speaks about the war with Iraq that was threatening Israel and here everyone is so relaxed."

The Argushi family's journey to Israel, like others making aliyah - was funded by JAFI, through donations from the worldwide Jewish Federation network including UJA Federation of Greater Toronto.

Calling all Past Members of the 59th Boy Scout Troop

The Boy Scout movement began in Canada in 1914, with the formation of the first Jewish troop coming about seven years later. Now, the UJA Federation Ontario Jewish Archives is - as was the case with the Scouts' themselves - "prepared" to document and showcase their long and storied history.

The idea came about thanks to the suggestion of a volunteer at the Archives, Dr. Sid Wise, after he inquired about whether the Archives would be interested in records documenting the Jewish Boy Scouts.

"I told him that we'd be thrilled," says Ellen Scheinberg, director of the Ontario Jewish Archives. "Sid contacted Ada Greenwood, whose husband was one of the original members of the Boy Scouts. She donated over 30 photographs which document her husband Saul's experiences with the 59th Troop in the early 1920s."

In fact, the 59th Troop was the first Jewish boy scout troup in Ontario, established in 1921 in Toronto under the direction of Edgar Reason. During the early years, the troop met at the Orde Street School. In 1922, a summer camp was opened for the Jewish scouts from this troop.

Camp Tamarack, as it was called, provided the boys with an opportunity to leave the city and learn new outdoor skills. The camp operated until 1972.

"After Mr. Reason passed away in 1956, leadership of the troop was transferred to Stanley G. Wilde," says Scheinberg. "As the Jewish community moved westward and north, a new site for cubs and scouts was needed. While the troop had met at the Clinton Street School, during the 1930s to 1950s, the Hillcrest School became another meeting spot after the community began to move north. Over the years, Jewish scout troops as well as wolf cub packs emerged, serving hundreds and later thousands of Jewish youth in Toronto."

Shortly after Dr. Wise got the ball rolling, the idea took on a life of its own as another volunteer, Dr. Martin Wolfish (who had been a member of the 59th Troop) became interested in finding more documentation relating to the Troop. Dr. Wolfish, in fact, donated a videotape showing scenes of the 59th Troop's camp, Camp Tamarack, during the summer of 1943. Through his involvement, more people came forward with material documenting the early days of the Jewish Scouts.

"These archival treasures provide a rare and limited glimpse at Jewish scouting life during the 1920s and 1940s," says Scheinberg. "The Ontario Jewish Archives is asking readers of the Canadian Jewish News, who were members of the 59th Troop, to consider donating any records that they have to us in order to create a more comprehensive and complete picture of the Jewish scouting movement in Toronto."

For more information, or to donate archival material, please contact Ellen Scheinberg at 416.635.2883 ext. 187 or e-mail Dr. Martin Wolfish at mgwolfish@aol.com.

Bregman takes the reins of UJA Federation's WC&A

Barbara Bregman

When listening to Barbara Bregman - the newly installed Chair of UJA Federation's Women's Campaign & Advocacy (WC&A) - speak about her goals for WC&A, her passion is easy to detect.

"It is a privilege for me to lead Women's Campaign and Advocacy in its life-saving, life-enriching work," she says. "The women's campaign gives us (women) a powerful and independent voice in the community. It also enables each of us to take responsibility for doing her share to promote Jewish life. I share UJA Federation's commitment to preserving sacred Jewish values."

The installation ceremony, at which outgoing chair Hinda Silber stepped down, featured past WC&A chair Lesley Binstock Offman as emcee and Holy Blossom Temple's Rabbi John Moscowitz as keynote speaker.

Bregman addressed her new Vice Chair, Fran Sonshine, as well as the new Executive and Board of WC&A.

"I am so fortunate to have a wonderful and impressive executive and board comprised of women of vision, and passion, each with their own unique and valuable talents. Fran Sonshine, my Vice Chair, is so talented, creative, and committed, and I sincerely thank her for coming on this incredible journey with me."

A long-time self-confessed "fan" of Women's Campaign & Advocacy, emphasis on "women," Bregman makes it clear that her goals as Chair of Women's Campaign are the same as those of Allan Silber and Richard Venn, Chairs of this year's UJA Federation Campaign 2004.

"We all have our own priorities, but who can argue that Israel is facing the most critical times of its history?" asks Bregman. "This is no longer just a war against terror, it's a war for survival and it's testing Israelis' resilience. The country's resources are being stretched to the limit. The economy is now worse than it's ever been before. We must show strength and flexibility in our support of Israel."

Bregman's appointment comes at a particularly troublesome time for Judaism, as anti-Semitism, often disguised as anti-Zionism, has reemerged.

"We must combat the rising tide of anti-Semitism, especially on college and university campuses," says Bregman. "This new wave of anti-Semitism is particularly alarming in that it is not only coming from right-wing lunatics, but from mainstream forums."

Bregman is quick to credit husband Michael's role as Chair, along with David Koschitzky, of UJA Federation's Campaign 2002, as one of her inspirations.

"Michael is my mentor, my role model, and sounding board," says Bregman. "His involvement in UJA Federation has resulted in my involvement in UJA as I witnessed first-hand the growth, satisfaction and rewards he reaped, as Chair of that campaign, that told me this was the right decision for me. This coming year should indeed be the best year of my life."

UJA mission visits devasted community

Since the 1994 bombing of AMIA, Argentina's central Jewish community building, and the collapse of five Jewish-owned banks, life has not been the same for Argentina's Jews. The situation has become so precarious that since last year almost 5,000 families have contacted The Jewish Agency For Israel (JAFI) – UJA Federation's overseas partner – to inquire about making aliyah.

Twenty prominent members of Toronto's Jewish community recently participated in a fact-finding trip to Argentina, sponsored by UIA Federations Canada, to see how JAFI's efforts have helped Argentina's Jews, and to determine what other steps need to be taken.

"The mission was extremely educational and enlightening," says Wendy Eisen, Chair of the mission which began in Buenos Aires. "We felt quite fortunate to meet Jewish leaders halfway around the world, but it was also very hard to meet Argentinean Jews whose lives have been so dramatically altered by their country's corrupt political and dismal economic situation."

Halfway through the trip, the group made an unscheduled stop in nearby Uruguay, a country of 3 million, 20,000 of whom are Jews.

"The most gratifying part of this trip was seeing the look on the faces of the Jewish people of Argentina," says participant Harry Gorman. "They were happy to see us there. We met many of the people who are suffering so terribly under these horrific conditions. We spoke to those who had lost their jobs, some of whom had as many as five children and are struggling to survive."

"The trip was really two-fold," says Maxyne Finklestein, Executive V.P. of UIA Federations Canada. "We wanted to provide some of our leading donors with an overview of Jewish Argentina and the role JAFI has played in terms of assistance, as well as deciding where else we can help down the road. We decided to go to Uruguay because its economy is so dependent on Argentina, and with the hardships there, they've been suffering badly as well."

Yossi Tanuri, UJA Federation's Israeli Emissary (bottom centre), joins participants of the recent UIA Federations Canada fact-finding trip to Argentina at the AMIA building in Buenos Aires.

Some of the highlights of the fact-finding mission included a visit to Argentina's first Jewish congregation, as well as AMIA. Before returning home, participants attended a special briefing on Argentinean aliyah where they met with olim and students, followed by a special ceremony for Yom Hazikaron, Israel's memorial day.

Greater Toronto Area

IT'S A MITZVAH: Toronto Heschel School held its first-ever Mitzvah Day earlier this month. Among the 400 participants were Michelle Friedlich-Pollock and her daughter Sarah Pollock, left, planting a "mitzvah garden;" and Jake Rotman with mom Michelle, preparing gift bags for patients at the Hospital for Sick Children. Other projects designed to "help repair the world" included hauling garbage out of Westgate Ravine and packing food at the North York Harvest Food Bank.

Funky fundraiser celebrates life

Raising money to support research and patient care at The Gerry & Nancy Pencer Brain Tumour Centre is the focus of this year's fundraiser, Bell Bottom Bash, taking place on May 29 at Toronto's Liberty Grand Entertainment Complex, Exhibition Place.

Bell Bottom Bash is a '70s-themed party featuring disco dancing at a Studio 54-style disco lounge recreated by designer Nicholas Pinney; '70s entertainment including a live band and a retro-DJ; '70s impersonators; go-go dancers; roller skaters, and dance coaches to get the party rockin'.

Classic '70s fashions, from funky platforms and frayed jeans, to vintage '70s couture, and groovy hairstyles, will be featured.

Event organizers aim to exceed last year's 600-plus guest list and net more than $500,000 through the support of corporate sponsorships, including Cott Corporation, and David and Stacey Cynamon.

Money will also be raised from the over 100 silent auction items, the live auction, and ticket sales that begin at $150 per ticket.

"Bell Bottom Bash is a celebration of life," said Nancy Pencer, president of The Gerry & Nancy Pencer Brain Trust.

"People will be coming together to enjoy a fabulous party, while at the same time, raising greatly needed funds for The Brain Tumour Centre."

Establishing The Gerry & Nancy Pencer Brain Tumour Centre at Princess Margaret Hospital was the idea of Gerry Pencer, former CEO of Cott Corporation.

Today, The Pencer Centre is Canada's most comprehensive brain tumour facility, revolutionizing the way patients are diagnosed, treated, educated, and supported throughout their illness.

"These efforts will keep my husband's dream alive, and make a difference in the quality of life of people living with brain tumors," said Nancy Pencer.

For more information, or to purchase tickets, call the Bell Bottom Bash hotline at 416-923-2999.

Israel Cancer Research Fund holds annual gala

The annual gala of the Israel Cancer Research Fund (ICRF) will honour physician and cancer researcher Robert Bell and travel agent Sara Pachter.

At the event, which will take place at the Sheraton Centre on May 29, Bell will receive the ICRF scientific award for his contribution to the medical community and for his work in cancer research. Pachter will receive the ICRF humanitarian award for her contributions to the Toronto Jewish community and for her contribution to tourism and travel to Israel.

Dr. Robert Bell

The evening will be dedicated to Carol Rose, who lost her battle with cancer last year.

Entertainment will be provided by jazz musicians Cleo Laine and John Dankworth.

Bell, 52, was born in Wales and earned his medical degree at McGill University. He is professor of surgery, division of orthopedics, at University of Toronto; co-director of the university musculoskeletal oncology unit at Mount Sinai Hospital; and an honorary lecturer at the University of Western Ontario. Since July 2000, he has been vice-president and chief operating officer of Princess Margaret Hospital.

His own research has been in the field of bone and soft tissue tumours, the class of tumour that afflicted Terry Fox. He has published many papers relating to orthopedic oncology, as well as a book, A Clinical Guide to Primary Bone Tumours.

Bell and his team of investigators have recently won a grant from the Canadian Institutes of Health Research for their interdisciplinary health research team project in musculoskeletal neoplasia.

Edmonton-born Pachter, 87, began leading tours to Israel in 1959, after watching an impromptu performance by the Israeli Imbal dancers. She has led more than 8,000 people, on 154 trips to the Jewish state. She has worked for the Fisher-Fremont Travel Agency since 1962.

Sara Pachter

Pachter and her late husband Harry volunteered for the Canadian Council of Christians and Jews, Boys Town Jerusalem, the Navy League Society, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto and Hamilton, UNICEF, State of Israel Bonds and B'nai Brith. She has been honoured by El Al, Air Canada, the Israel Government Tourist Office, B'nai Brith Women International, and State of Israel Bonds.

The ICRF is the largest private funder of cancer research in Israel, supporting projects in some 22 hospitals and institutions. It is one of the few organizations that offers grants to junior scientists who often have no access to research monies.

Shaarei Shomayim concert celebrates 75 years

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Shaarei Shomayim Congregation will be celebrating its 75th anniversary this year.

On June 10 at 7:30 p.m., Shaarei Shomayim will open a year of celebrations with a gala concert featuring renowned cantors Benjamin Warschawski of Baltimore, Moshe Haschel of St. John's Wood Synagogue in London, England, and Yaakov Motzen and Shlomo Simcha Sufrin of Shaarei Shomayim.

Cantor Benjamin Maissner of Holy Blossom Temple will conduct the Shaarei Shomayim Choir and Cantor Daniel Gildar will accompany on the piano in a concert featuring a wide-ranging repertoire of cantorial, Hebrew, chassidic and operatic compositions.

"We are very excited about the kick-off concert and the activities that will take place throughout the year," said event co-chair Joyce Eklove. "We will be looking back through our history and recognize the people and events that contributed to the growth of our modern Orthodox synagogue, where we have four generations of members,"

Several of the shul's former rabbis will attend the concert, including Rabbi Emanuel Forman and Rabbi Henry Hoschander.

The growth and development of Shaarei Shomayim mirrors the economic, geographic and social developments of Toronto's Jewish community from the mid 1920s to the present day.

In the 1920s, wealthier Jews were flocking to the Forest Hill area off Spadina Road north of St. Clair Avenue. At the same time, a new group of businessmen and professionals were moving along St. Clair toward Christie and Dufferin streets and Lansdowne Avenue. These new residential areas were served by an increasing number of retail shops.

For Shaarei Shomayim's 50th anniversary, historian Stephen Speisman wrote about a minyan that had been organized in the McKay Avenue home of a shochet named Louis (Leib) Rasky. In 1928, Rasky urged some young residents to take over the fledgling shul, which was by then called Brothers of Jacob (B'nai Jacob) Congregation. Membership was $5 a year, including two seats for the High Holy Days.

The synagogue was later renamed Shaarei Shomayim.

Throughout the Depression, the congregation rented quarters at 563 Christie St. in a large house owned by the Toronto Hebrew Free School, now called the Associate Hebrew Schools of Toronto.

Despite difficulty making rent payments, the congregation hired its first rabbi, Rabbi Israel Halevy Hurwitz, and it attempted – without success – to raise funds to buy its deteriorating Christie Street building.

In 1936, members found out that a block of land was for sale on the north side of St. Clair west of Atlas Avenue. They raised a deposit, and after many stumbling blocks, they were able to construct the basement portion of the building.

During the 1940s, many things changed. Rabbi David Monson, the shul's spiritual leader, joined the armed forces and was succeeded by Rabbi Judah Washer in 1944.

In 1947 the shul's upper floor was completed and Shaarei Shomayim, retaining its modern Orthodox philosophy and dramatically increasing its membership to 400, became a hub of activity for members of all ages and for the wider Jewish community.

In 1948, three women from the sisterhood were invited to sit on the board of directors, a first for the shul.

The formal dedication of the building was held in November 1949. Cantor Leibele Waldman conducted the services and numerous government dignitaries participated. Meyer Gasner chaired the banquet, which included a major speech by Samuel Belkin, president of Yeshiva University.

In the shul's 25th year, Rabbi Washer left to take a position in the United States and Rabbi Walter Wurzburger became the new rabbi.

Before long, it became evident that the St. Clair district was changing, and that the Jewish population was moving northward. The synagogue searched in earnest for a new location.

In 1962, Shaarei Shomayim acquired land at its present site on Glencairn Avenue, just east of Bathurst Street between Eglinton and Lawrence avenues.

Just two years later, the synagogue's current building was begun.

"Today, we have more than 1,000 members and we are one of the largest Orthodox congregations in North America," said shul president Paul Herbert.

"We have many minyanim, including a Pray and Learn service, classes, youth groups, interest groups, a brotherhood and a sisterhood, and many special events."

Apple Charlie brings back childhood memories

By LISA SOLOMON
Special to The CJN

"I feel so unwelcome!" my sister Wendy said in mock horror about the standard-size pie in the standard-size pie plate my mother placed before her.

For even as a full-grown adult with three children of her own, she still wanted – no, expected, no, yearned for – the traditional Friday night 11x14 inch glass baking dish she remembered from our childhood, brimming with fresh, warm, tart, thick-crusted Apple Charlie.

In a family with five brothers and sisters, the dessert was just enough for one meal, and for the one lucky person who snuck downstairs early enough the next morning to claim the last square corner piece, straight from the refrigerator, with a cold glass of milk.

Of course, we all laughed at my sister's small-pie crisis, but it really wasn't funny.

Because even as full grown adults, with lives and apples of our own, Apple Charlie, or to use its proper German name, "Apfel Charlotte," remains serious business in our family.

It is our family's most prized dessert, a recipe passed down from my German Grandmother (Oma), to my mom, to us. Although none of us bake it regularly – yet.

One time, many years ago, with my brother just out of college and me on my way, I called my mom in Atlanta, Ga., from his apartment in Cape Canaveral, Fla., and asked for the recipe. He seemed lonely in his new town, so far away from home, and I wanted to surprise him.

So I walked to the grocery store, bought the apples, the Crisco, the flour, and in between looking at the beautiful view of the Banana River, and sipping sun tea, I made my first Apple Charlie.

When he walked up the sunny metal staircase after work, the window was open, and the fresh-baked Apple Charlie filled the air. And when I saw the look on my big brother's face, I understood my mother just a bit better.

For me, for all of us, as my sister's reaction indicated, Apple Charlie means home.

We had it every other Friday night after dinner, alternating with the chocolate chip yeast cake and the glazed rum bundt cake, which belong in another story. It was a request for many early birthday parties, and my mother made sure she had one baking in the oven when her growing children began leaving and returning from camp, college, far away new homes and ones more close by.

She even went so far as to send a frozen Apple Charlie to my sister when she was living in Israel. That one rotted.

But the image of my mother, sitting at the kitchen table, peeling pound after pound of Granny Smith apples, long spirals of green in one bowl, white fresh slices in another, will never fade.

She used a gliding motion, filled with precision, firmness, and love, while on her face, she held a quiet calm, knowing how warm and happy her efforts made her family.

My grandmother made Apple Charlie too. Hers was a lighter dough, and prepared in more delicate portions, but equally delicious.

Over the years, my mother experimented with the thick double crust – Crisco, not Crisco, margarine, butter, all white flour, some whole wheat flour, back to all white, and now a southern flour, White Lilly.

Still, I can't remember one that wasn't cozy in just the right way, piled high with not-too-sweet soft, warm apples, sometimes mixed with raisins, sometimes not, all protected in a thick, rustic crust, and always, always a reminder that – with my very first, fat, steaming forkful – no matter what, I have a home.

APPLE CHARLIE

Pie Crust: (For 9 inch pie plate)
1 cup vegetable shortening
2 cups all purpose flour
1 tsp. baking powder
2-3 tbsp. sugar (to taste)
pinch of salt
2 large eggs
1 tsp. almond extract

Filling:
3 lbs. Granny Smith apples (7-8 medium)
1 tbsp. fresh squeezed lemon juice
½ cup dark raisins
¼ tsp. cinnamon
⅛ tsp. nutmeg
pinch of cloves (optional)
1 tbsp. sugar
1 tbsp. butter

Topping:
1 egg yolk
1 tbsp. water
¼ cup slivered or whole almonds (optional)

Filling: Peel and core apples. Slice into fine slices (about 12 per apple) and place in a large bowl, tossing with lemon juice to hold colour. The width of the slices is personal preference, but thicker takes longer to bake. Add raisins, cinnamon, nutmeg, and cloves, if desired. Toss to mix. Cover and refrigerate.

Pie Crust: In a large bowl of electric mixer, mix flour, sugar, baking powder and salt. With mixer on lowest speed, slowly mix vegetable shortening into flour mixture. Add eggs and almond extract, mixing just until dough comes together and is soft and light to touch. Don't over mix. Separate dough into two equal parts.

Preheat oven to 350. With lightly floured rolling pin on lightly floured surface, working from the centre out, roll dough half into round pie shape large enough to cover complete bottom and side surfaces. Lift into bottom of dish and shape pressing into edges and up the sides, and over the edge. Fill with apple mixture. Sprinkle sugar over apples and dot with butter.

Roll out second half of dough larger then pie plate to completely cover apple filling. Lay on top of apples, bringing edges together by pinching overhang to top. Beat egg yolk and water together and brush egg mixture onto top crust. Arrange almonds, if desired. Cut six slits, in pairs, for steam to escape.

Bake at 350 at least 45 minutes. Check. Top should be a golden brown, apple softened completely. If not, turn oven to 200 and bake 5-15 minutes more, to fully cook apples. Serves 10.

Centennial students produce Holocaust web site

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

When Israeli-born Shahaff Idan began working on a Holocaust Web site with four non-Jewish students at Centennial College, he felt that he was the only one with a connection to the project. That feeling dissipated quickly, he said. "We're all people, and it affected all of us the same way."

Team leader Merewyn Hines, 26, a native of British Columbia, said the nature of the material they were working with made the task difficult emotionally. It's one thing to read books or see Hollywood movies, she said. "It's another thing to be sitting there with the propaganda in your hands and realize how calculated everything was that the Nazis did. It was shocking."

Hines, Idan and fellow new media design students Yvette Farkas, Victor Stan and Haruyo Asada (originally from Hungary, Romania and Japan respectively) took on the task of creating a Web site (www.centennialcollege.ca/holocaust_pollock) for Centennial's John and Molly Pollock Holocaust Collection for the 138-hour internship required by their program, but ended up putting in even more hours, said Hines.

The 1,000-item collection of Holocaust literature and propaganda from Nazi Germany was donated to the culturally diverse community college in Scarborough two years ago as a learning resource for students and the greater community.

The site provides excerpts from publications, and audio and video interviews with survivors and with the Pollocks. There are also links to the college curriculum that has grown from the collection.

Idan – a 31-year-old who spent his formative years in Israel and England and has a master's degree in psychology from the University of Haifa – has been hired to continue the project the students began in early 2003, expanding the Web site by scanning pre-war German Jewish newspapers.

Although he studied the Holocaust from Grade 2 to Grade 11 in Israel and his grandmother lost 10 of her 12 siblings in the Shoah, Idan, who served as the team's videographer and programmer, said he never knew "how severe and how brutal and how cruel" the Nazis were until this year.

"They tried to protect us," he recalls. "Nobody ever spoke about medical experiments."

Despite the warning about shocking and visually upsetting material on the Web site, the sometimes teary meetings and bad dreams suffered by Idan, the two students who spoke to The CJN had no regrets about working on it.

"I knew it was a worthwhile project. I never would have wanted anything else," said Hines, who has a master's degree in museum studies. "Not that other internships weren't important, but we feel we were part of something that's more than just our grades."

"I'm leaving something behind that actually matters," said Idan. "I got to learn a lot, meet interesting people, and to appreciate my life and the time I was born."

Centennial College students display the Web site they created. Standing, from left, are Shahaff Idan, Yvette Farkas and Victor Stan. Team leader Merewyn Hines is seated at left, with Haruyo Asada.

U of T Yiddish program renamed for Green family

Amrhein said that "by electing to fund Yiddish studies at the University of Toronto, Al and Malka Green will have an immeasurable impact on scholars eager to learn about this vibrant 1,000-year-old language and its fascinating culture and history."

He added that in gaining a receptive academic milieu where Yiddish can be studied and taught, the Greens "are preserving – for the enrichment of the whole world – a culture that was in danger of vanishing. Their act of conserving the past and bringing it forward into the future makes the very existence of this program, unique in Canada, a tangible testament to the will of people to remember and to do honour."

U of T president Robert Birgeneau also thanked the Greens for their gift and acknowledged the work of the Yiddish studies committee and donors who have supported the Yiddish program over the years.

Jewish population drops eight per cent in Quebec

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

The number of Jews by religion in Quebec dropped by eight per cent over the past decade to 89,915 and they are aging. If good news can be drawn from the 2001 census data released last week by Statistics Canada, it is that the figure for Quebecers who identify themselves as Jews by religious affiliation is notably higher than that for those who cite Jewish as an ethnic/cultural origin.

Until now, FEDERATION CJA and Canadian Jewish Congress have spoken of a 101,000-member community.

Executive vice-president Danyael Cantor said FEDERATION CJA's demographer Charles Shahar will crunch the religious and ethnic data, according to a formula used in the past, to come up with a "definite" Jewish population, which he expects will be ready by the end of this month.

"For sure, it will be down from 101,000, but I think it will be a little higher than 89,000," he said.

The vast majority of Jews by religion live in Montreal: 88,765.

According to the 1991 census, the province had 97,730 Jews by religion, who represented 1.4 per cent of the total population. Now, this group's standing has slipped slightly to 1.3 per cent of Quebecers. In Montreal, Jews represent three per cent of the population.

Jews are no longer the largest non-Christian religious group. That description now belongs to Muslims, whose number increased dramatically in Quebec between 1991 and 2001, from 44,930 to 108,620.

"In the space of 10 years, we have seen the situation change from more than twice as many Jews as Muslims to 20,000 fewer Jews than Muslims," said Jack Jedwab, executive director of the Association for Canadian Studies.

The median age of Jews is 42.5 years, while among Muslims it is 28.2. Only mainline Protestant denominations have a higher median age than Jews. The median age for the total population is 38.4.

Quebec's Jews are unique among Canadian Jewish communities for having a higher number of people identifying themselves as Jewish by religion than ethnicity, said Jedwab.

Nationally, just under 330,000 Jews by religion were recorded, while the ethnic figure was over 348,000. That seems logical given that the latter figure includes those who name Jewish as part of a multiple response to who their ancestors were and may not be Jewish in any meaningful sense themselves.

(The census question on religion asked about affiliation only; respondents need not actually practise that religion.)

The ethnic data released in January showed 82,450 persons in Quebec identifying Jewish as either the sole ethnicity of their ancestors or one of up to four. (In Montreal, there were 80,390.)

Jedwab, who has conducted a number of demographic studies of Jews and other minorities, said he expected the religion figure to be higher in Quebec, because that has been the case historically, but by about 3,000 to 4,000 only.

While there were more religious than ethnic Jews in Quebec in 1991, the gap was much narrower, he said. "It requires further examination."

Part of the explanation may be that Russian immigrant Jews, who probably number a few thousand, identified themselves as Russians only ethnically, he said. That, however, might have been the case in other parts of Canada.

"There's a strong sense of religious Jewish identity in Quebec, more so than ethnic," Jedwab said. "There is less mixing with other people here. Traditionally, Quebec society has been more segmented, with Catholic and Protestant institutions. Language is also a barrier."

Cantor was not surprised that the religion figure was higher. "That's in keeping with our sense of ourselves. This is a traditional community with Old World values."

Jedwab does not think any appreciable number of Jews identified themselves as having "no religion," a growing trend in the country generally.

While Quebec Jews are thought of as an older community, their median age (42.5) is not much higher than the national figure of 41.5. Jedwab thinks that can be attributed to the large number of children among Orthodox Jews in Montreal.

Montreal does have the second highest percentage of Jews by religion over age 65 of any major Jewish community – 22.2 per cent . Only Winnipeg has a higher figure at slightly over 23 per cent. By comparison, 15.9 per cent of Toronto Jews are over 65 and the national figure is 17.7 per cent.

At the other end of the spectrum, 19.2 per cent of Montreal Jews are 15 and under.

Although the religion data is more encouraging than the ethnic number for the Quebec Jewish community, Jedwab thinks there is a "psychological" impact in falling below the 90,000. "And the trend will probably continue downward," he said.

Cantor does not agree. He believes the initiatives that FEDERATION CJA launched through the 1990s to retain Jews in Quebec, like ProMontreal, which helps young Jews start careers, and the expansion of the Jewish Community Campus, as well as more active recruitment of Jewish immigrants, will begin to have an impact this decade. The number of inquiries from Jews about immigrating to Quebec has "increased exponentially" in the past couple of years, he said.

"I think we may have begun to turn the corner in the late '90s... We are better prepared for the future."

Immigration seen as key to reverse Jewish decline

Other faith groups also boosted their numbers far in excess of the increase among Jews. The number of Buddhists rose by 84 per cent and the proportion of Sikhs and Hindus each increased by 89 per cent.

The Jewish increase also seems low compared to the seven per cent rise in Jews by religion between 1981 and 1991.

"I don't think you can get a clear picture based just on the religion numbers," said Charles Shahar, head of the National Jewish Demographic Study for UIA Federations Canada (UIAFC). "They really don't give an accurate reading. Both the numbers on religion and ethnicity need to be taken into account."

The 2001 census asked about Canadians' religion as well as ethnic origin. Jews were the only group to fit both categories.

The census tallied 348,605 Canadians with Jewish ethnic origins, a drop of about one per cent from the 1996 mini-census, and more than five per cent compared to 1991.

When the ethnic numbers were released earlier this year, some experts said they reflect a decline in the Jewish population, while others were confident the figures on religion would show Canada's Jews have grown by at least 10 per cent.

Traditionally, planners blend the two figures, and exclude from the total only those who say they have Jewish ethnocultural roots but profess another religion. Those who consider themselves ethnically Jewish but list "no religion" on the census are counted in the Jewish total.

The official tally community planners have relied on since 1991 is 356,315 Jews in Canada. They believe the real number today is higher than what the 2001 census produced.

Nevertheless, officials agree that what helped boost numbers among other religious groups – immigration – only marginally affected the Jewish community.

Traditional sources of Jewish immigration – the former Soviet Union and South Africa – are pretty much spent, says Shahar. Individual federations, such as Montreal and Winnipeg, are now actively recruiting Jews from South America, notably Argentina.

Jewish immigration to Canada continues, however. Perry Romberg of UIAFC says 22,000 Jewish immigrants came to Canada from 1991 to 2001, and an average 2,500 Jewish immigrants arrive in this country annually, half of them from the former Soviet Union.

By contrast, seven per cent of all immigrants over the past 10 years were Hindu and five per cent were Sikh. More than 275,000 newcomers were Muslim.

"We need to understand that if the Jewish community wants to stay viable, the focus has to be on immigration and to make sure immigrants are properly absorbed," said Shahar, who plans to produce a dozen studies in the coming months on Jewish communities across the country, incorporating such variables as education, family structure, mobility, poverty, intermarriage and the Sephardi/Ashkenazi breakdown.

Shahar notes another straw in the wind: the age of the average Muslim in Canada is 28, compared to a national average of 37 and a mean age in the Jewish community of 45.

The census figures tell a different story in virtually every region of the country. In Quebec, wary officials tried to put the best face on figures showing an aging community that has shrunk by eight per cent to below 90,000 (see story on the census results in Quebec, p. 29).

Nearly half of Canada's Jews live in Ontario, where the number of Jews rose by 8.6 per cent over the previous decade. Toronto remains Canada's major Jewish centre. The city's population grew from 151,000 Jews by religion to 164,510, a nine per cent increase. Ottawa's Jewish population remained stable at just over 11,000.

The big winner seems to be British Columbia, where Jews by religion increased by about 27 per cent, to more than 21,000. Over 17,000 of them are in Vancouver.

Alberta also saw an increase in Jews by religion, by 11 per cent.

Manitoba, though, saw a decline of 4.6 per cent, and Winnipeg's Jewish population dropped from 15,000 to 12,765.

Robert Brym, a University of Toronto sociologist and a long-time observer of Jewish population trends, feels the numbers point to increasing polarization in the community.

"There are fewer 'ethnic' Jews, which on some level shows assimilation and integration, and more 'religious' Jews, which shows more intensification of beliefs," he said.

As well, he said Jews by religion have moved to B.C., Alberta and Ontario – Canada's three richest provinces. "Religious Jews are moving away, and enriching the already well-off regions, leaving behind places that are less well-off."

Leo Davids, a sociologist at York University, says the community "is potentially in trouble" if immigration is not substantially increased.

One of the problems, he said, is that there seems to be no national Jewish strategy.

"To what extent can Canada act nationally? Is Canadian Jewry 'mobilizable,' the way it is in Britain? Canada doesn't seem to have the mechanisms in place. Canadian Jewish Congress has fallen into a slump, and it's individual cities that are acting," Davids said.

He called the Jewish increase in Toronto "disappointing," saying community officials expected the population to be about 175,000.

Davids said the Jewish exodus from Quebec, particularly among the young, did not seem to have been stemmed in the decade covered, despite the community's best efforts.

Sephardi conference

Most of the proceedings will be in French, with some English and Spanish presentations. One plenary will be presented entirely in Spanish by Jacob Hassan of the Instituto de Filologia in Madrid.

The event's sponsors include Heritage Canada and various ministries of the provincial government, such as Quebec's Ministry of Culture, as well as Spain's ambassador to Canada, José Cuenca, Castiel said.

The conference will close with a showing of Montrealer Eyal Bitton's film, King David: The Musical May 26 at 8 p.m. at the Oscar Peterson Hall on Concordia's Loyola campus. For tickets, call 733-4998.

Following the conference, on May 27 at 8 p.m., the Sephardic Cultural Institute will present a musical evening at the Théâtre Outremont with Samy Elmaghribi, a composer and performer of traditional North African music. For tickets to this event, call 735-5565 ext. 100.

Montreal is home to approximately 25,000 Sephardi Jews of North African and Middle Eastern origin who began settling here in the late 1950s.

The biggest obstacle on the road to peace

Paul Koring's ever-so-brief remark in the national edition of the Globe and Mail (May 13) that the Palestinian claim of a "right of return" is "internationally recognized" may seem innocuous to many readers. After all, the claim to a "right of return" has been repeated so often by Palestinians and their supporters around the world that it is easy to assume its legitimacy in international law. But there is controversy about whether this "right" is "internationally recognized," making such an assumption wrong. No amount of repetition about its legitimacy will change that.

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

The cardinal tenet of journalism is the search for truth. And here is a truth journalists should remember: there is no universally accepted "right of return" in international law. And in the case of the Palestinians, there is definitely no "right of return" to someone else's land – Israel – against which the Palestinian leadership and Arab states committed aggression in 1947-48.

First, the Palestinians and the Arabs violently rejected the November 1947 UN partition resolution that would have resulted in both a Jewish and a Palestinian state. Then when Israel was established in May 1948, they attacked, hoping to destroy the Jewish state in its infancy. This war caused the Palestinian refugee problem that has been allowed to fester to this day.

Approximately 700,000 Palestinians fled the 1948 fighting (and in some isolated areas, such as Ramle and Lod, they were evicted by Israeli forces in the course of combat). They and their descendants, consigned to refugee camps, have been used by the Arab states as political pawns ever since in an ongoing propaganda war against Israel, aided by a UN bureaucracy, the United Nations Relief and Works Agency for Palestine Refugees in the Near East (UNWRA), which was specifically established to "look after" the Palestinians, who were accorded a status that is unique among all refugees in the world. Consider the fact that an equal number of Jews were forced to flee the Arab world after Israel's creation but were immediately absorbed into the tiny State of Israel, and the contrast becomes stark.

For decades, Palestinians have maintained that UN General Assembly Resolution 194 (of December 1948) enshrines their "right of return" and so accords it international legitimacy.

Journalists who accept this ought to look up the resolution. Most of it is directed to the issue of Jerusalem. One small section deals with refugees, but it never mentions the word "right." It says only that refugees should be "permitted" to return to their homes if they're prepared to live in peace with Israel, or they can accept compensation. The permission was Israel's to grant or reject. While the Arabs now embrace Resolution 194, it should be noted that in 1948 the Arab states at the UN uniformly voted against it, because they were waging a war to eliminate Israel. That same rejectionist attitude, unfortunately, prevails for many Arabs today.

Currently, Israel is expected to accept a "road map" leading to eventual Palestinian statehood. But the Palestinians, even under the "moderate" leadership of PA Prime Minister Mahmoud Abbas, are insistent on their "right of return" to Israel. This means the Palestinians want two Palestinian states – their own and Israel – because if the Palestinian refugees are allowed to settle in Israel, it would cease to exist as a Jewish state.

Is it any wonder that Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon has objections to the road map, which leaves the "right of return" to the final stage of discussion?

This is the issue that caused the Camp David talks in the summer of 2000 to collapse and that threatens, more than any other factor, to eventually derail this plan, too.

Argentine Jewish population in Winnipeg growing rapidly

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Robby and Roxie Ader, who first visited Canada in 1984, were the first in a growing number of Argentine Jewish families to become part of Winnipeg's Jewish community in the last few years.

The Aders, who had family in Montreal and Ottawa and wanted to immigrate to Canada, chose to come to Winnipeg after hearing Larry Hurtig, Jewish Community Council president, talk about the city and its Jewish community on his first trip to Buenos Aires in 1995.

Hurtig, at the time, was following up on an initiative suggested by former Manitoba premier Gary Filmon.

According to figures provided by Winnipeg Jewish Federation/CJA planning director Faye Rosenberg-Cohen and Federation/CJA senior immigration officer Evelyn Hecht at the end of last year, 26 families from Buenos Aires – 47 adults and 31 children – had followed the Aders' lead.

So far this year, 13 more families – 25 adults and 17 children – have arrived from Argentina, 21 more families – 39 adults, 21 children – are expected in May and June, and as many as 40 more may arrive by the end of the year.

The new immigrants are boosting the population of Winnipeg's Jewish community, which has been struggling for years with a steady decline in numbers.

In 1960 it numbered about 19,000 Jews, and currently it has between 13,000 and 14,000, many of whom are part of the older generation.

The Argentine immigration has been facilitated by the provincial government through its provincial nominee program, which allows Manitoba to fast-track skilled immigrants who want to come.

Winnipeg, and Manitoba in general, are faced with slow population growth and an aging population, and the Argentinians are the type of educated, professional people the province is trying to attract.

The Argentinians are making their presence felt in their new home. For Passover this year, 120 of them – with the support of B'nai Brith – celebrated Winnipeg's first Latin American seder.

There is also a new Spanish-speaking B'nai Brith chapter and a relatively new, 150-member Spanish-speaking club consisting of Jewish and non-Jewish South American immigrants to Winnipeg.

As well, most of the children attend the Jewish day schools here.

"It is easier to become involved in the Jewish community here than in Buenos Aires," says Gustavo Rymberg, an award-winning graphic designer who brought his family here in 1998.

"The community was too big and too dispersed there. Coming here, I learned the concepts of donating money and time to the community. I really enjoy it."

Rymberg says his "new community is amazing. I work at the Rose and Max Rady Jewish Community Centre and deal with the community every day. I find the people here very welcoming and supportive."

Ontario municipal leaders join Israel mission

By MORDECHAI BEN-DAT
Editor

TEL AVIV — Two of Israel's most senior cabinet ministers met last Wednesday with a delegation of Ontario municipal officials that included regional mayors and Ontario's associate minister of municipal affairs to convey the Israel government's gratitude for the group's visit to the Jewish state.

Dubbed the "mayors' mission" by the Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region, which organized the trip, the 19-member delegation spent five days in Israel touring the country and meeting Israelis. The mission was led jointly by Thornhill MPP Tina Molinari, associate minister of municipal affairs, and by Ed Morgan, chair of CJC's Ontario region.

Despite a major operation the night before by the Israeli army in Gaza in response to a rocket attack on the Negev town of Sderot that wounded 13 Israelis, Defence Minister Shaul Mofaz received the Canadian visitors at his Tel Aviv headquarters.

Mofaz gave them an overview of Israel's strategic situation after the recent appointment of Mahmoud Abbas as prime minister of the Palestinian Authority (PA) and the overthrow of Iraqi leader Saddam Hussein.

Mofaz expressed concern that Israel would now have to deal with a "bifocal leadership" of the PA, which he said would complicate rather than simplify matters for Israel. He also lamented Abbas' suggestion that Israel agree to a ceasefire.

"Israel is against any approach that included a ceasefire of terrorist operations against Israel," Mofaz said. "During a ceasefire, the terrorist infrastructure would grow, only to be used at a later date against Israel."

The minister commended the United States for its "impressive military campaign" in Iraq and for "sending a clear message to Syria and Iran."

Mofaz expressed Israel's concern with Iran's Russian-supported efforts to become a nuclear power, which he said would be "very dangerous for Israel and for the region" if successful.

The minister's remarks to the group took a more poignant turn when he expressed, on three separate occasions, his deep appreciation for their visit.

"It is very, very important to us these days that you are here showing solidarity and support for Israel and for its people," he said at the end of the meeting.

Later that evening, at the King David Hotel in Jerusalem, Finance Minister Benjamin Netanyahu took time away from tense, ongoing talks to settle a renewed general strike by the Histadrut, Israel's umbrella labour union organization, to brief the Canadian visitors on his government's economic plan to overhaul the public sector.

Earlier in the day, a group of the CJC's national executive joined the mayors' mission to have lunch with Tel Aviv Mayor Ron Huldai.

The mission's five-day, whirlwind itinerary included visits with Israeli municipal officials, including Huldai, as well as visits to Metulla, the Golan Heights and the Galilee in the north, and the Jordan River. Morgan said the purpose of the trip "was to increase Canadian awareness of the challenges faced and overcome by Israel. We wanted the mayors to see how the challenges of immigrant absorption, rapid development and security concerns have been handled by their Israeli counterparts."

Except for Toronto Councillor Mike Feldman and York Region Chair Bill Fisch, the mission's participants were seeing Israel for the first time.

The CJN joined the group midway through their trip on Wednesday and found them to be moved by their experiences in the Jewish state.

"This trip has been absolutely amazing," said Molinari. "Having spent time in Israel has given me a real understanding of what the people here feel. You can't get that feeling merely by reading about it."

Ken Boshcoff, mayor of Thunder Bay and president of the Association of Municipalities of Ontario, said he had always wanted to visit Israel, and the mission offered him "a perfect learning opportunity to do so." He indicated his special interest in joint Canadian-Israeli projects, such as the Canada Centre in Metulla and the twinning of Vaughan with Ramle.

In his thanks to Netanyahu for his presentation to the group, Boshcoff said, "We will certainly have a message to bring back to our fellow Canadians that Israel is a wonderful nation and is a great place to visit. We will be deeply supportive and you can count on us."

Also taking part in the mission were Vaughan mayor Michael Di Biase; Bracebridge mayor Scott Northmore; Sudbury mayor James Gordon; Vaughan councillor Susan Kadis; Frank Miele, Vaughan's commissioner of economic technology, development and community; and Ottawa Councillor Alex Munter.

Arafat strengthens his grip on the PA

By AMOS HAREL
Ha'aretz Daily Newspapers Limited

JERUSALEM — Just a few days ahead of last Saturday's scheduled meeting between Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon and Palestinian Prime Minister Mahmoud Abbas, Israeli security sources said they believe Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat is strengthening his hold on the PA.

Recently, Arafat received an urgent request for $20,000 (US) to buy 6,000 metres of cloth to make uniforms for the Palestinian police. Arafat approved and signed it and instructed Finance Minister Salam Fayyad to transfer the money.

Why is the chairman allocating funds, and why is he still involved with the security organizations, which should have been transferred to the supervision of the new prime minister, Abbas? The Israel Defence Forces would also like to know.

But Arafat's business is hardly restricted to fashion.

The sums he has been giving out lately, for various purposes, are described as an avalanche.

In addition to the many terrorist alerts, military intelligence and the Shin Bet are in rare accord that Abbas is showing weakness in the face of Arafat's manoeuvres.

Abbas is having difficulty gaining public support, without which he will not be able to declare war on the terror organizations. At present, he appears to prefer talks with Hamas and Islamic Jihad. Abbas is already in touch with Hamas leadership abroad in an effort to launch a new round of Cairo talks this week. Sources believe Abbas' painful journey to the prime minister's office has considerably damaged his status.

He conducted negotiations fraught with mistakes, alienated the Fatah, and was forced to give in to Arafat repeatedly. "[Abbas] won no victory over Arafat," an Israeli security source says. "He formed a cabinet only under Egyptian and American pressure.

"The cabinet's legitimacy is shaky, it acts in Arafat's shadow and is burdened by huge expectations. Abbas is starting out bruised and bleeding and must navigate his way among three minefields – Americans, Israelis and Palestinians."

Palestinian President Yasser Arafat and Prime Minister Mahmoud Abbas.
[RNS/Reuters photo]

Part of the problem is money. In the past weeks, Arafat is re-emerging as the one holding the purse strings. His bureau is allocating funds to various entities, from Fatah activists in Bethlehem to PA ministers to security groups in Jenin.

Can Fayyad decide not to approve the allocations, a senior Palestinian was asked by an Israeli officer? "Woe betide Fayyad if he fails to implement an order Arafat signed," was the response.

Israel may be disappointed with Fayyad, but is still pinning hopes on Mohamed Dahlan, the minister of state for security affairs.

Many of the concessions Abbas made to Arafat were intended to preserve Dahlan's status in the new cabinet. Now Abbas and Dahlan are negotiating with Jibril Rajoub, the former PA head of preventive security in the West Bank, whom they need especially to rehabilitate the infrastructure of the security apparatus there. They can either appoint Rajoub police inspector general or reinstate him in his previous post.

Rajoub, who recently returned from medical treatment overseas, has yet to recover from the blow he received from the Shin Bet on one hand and Arafat on the other at the beginning of Operation Defensive Shield, when the IDF besieged his headquarters in Bitouniyah. Rajoub will now have to consider whether to reconcile with Dahlan, whom he accused of aiding in his downfall and whether to accept his authority.

Dahlan, for his part, is expected to make peace with his old adversary Israeli Defence Minister Shaul Mofaz, whom he will probably meet this week. At the beginning of the Oslo days, when Mofaz headed the Central Command and Dahlan the West Bank's strong man, the two regarded each other as friends. But when the second intifadah began, Dahlan called Mofaz a "war criminal" and severed ties with him.

Despite the difficulties, some Fatah activists expect Abbas and his men to confront Hamas. But to do so, the Palestinian security organizations will have to rebuild at least some confidence with their Israeli colleagues. Meanwhile, this seems nearly impossible.

The Week in Israel

May 12

• Police arrested 15 leaders of the Islamic Movement for allegedly aiding Hamas. They are suspected of illegally channelling millions of dollars to terrorist organizations in the West Bank and Gaza Strip, including money that went to the families of suicide bombers. Thirteen of the suspects were detained in overnight raids, and the final two were arrested Tuesday.

May 13

• Public sector workers renewed a general strike after talks between government and union leaders on an emergency economic plan broke down. Ports, trains and government offices were closed, schools opened late and there were delays at Ben-Gurion Airport.

• Dismantling communities in the West Bank and Gaza is "not an issue on the horizon," Prime Minister Ariel Sharon told the Jerusalem Post. He also said his recent comments suggesting the West Bank towns of Beit El and Shilo will be dismantled were misinterpreted and repeated his acceptance of a Palestinian state.

May 14

• In a sharp about-face, Israel's gross domestic product grew in the first quarter of the year by 2.5 per cent per annum, after a small rise of 0.1 per cent in the last quarter of 2002, and a contraction of 0.2 per cent in the third quarter.

May 15

• Responding to Public Security Minister Tzachi Hanegbi's comment Wednesday that the Temple Mount would soon be opened to Jews for visits and prayers, the director of the Muslim Waqf said non-Muslims are not welcome there.

May 16

• On a visit to London, Foreign Minister Silvan Shalom said Israel was unlikely to accept the "road map" to peace without amendments. He told reporters Israel has 14 suggested changes to the plan.

Canada has turned the corner on SARS.

Respected health professionals and specialists in disease control are all coming to the same conclusion: Canada has turned the corner on SARS. To put things in perspective, Health Canada believes it is important to remember the following points:

- The number of people who have recovered from SARS is going up.
- The total number of people in quarantine is going down.

"Canada has provided such enormous leadership to all of us in the global community."

Dr. Julie Gerberding, Director of U.S. Centers for Disease Control in Atlanta – Global News 6:30 p.m., Friday, May 2, 2003

"Canada was doing everything right, including screening passengers as they left."

Dr. David Heymann, World Health Organization, Executive Director of Communicable Diseases – Closing news conference, Special international meeting on SARS – Toronto, Thursday, May 1, 2003

"It's safe to travel to Toronto."

Dr. Paul Gully, Health Canada – Toronto Star, Thursday, April 24, 2003

"Toronto continues to be a safe place. Anyone who's travelling to Toronto, either for business or pleasure, should be reassured that it is safe to do so."

Dr. Colin D'Cunha, Commissioner of Public Health and Chief Medical Officer of Health – Toronto Star, Thursday, April 24, 2003

Thanks to the ceaseless efforts and hard work of health care workers, the threat of SARS is being dealt with across the country. As for Toronto, all the facts indicate that it is safe to work, live and travel there.

Bush offers vision of Mideast trade

By MATTHEW E. BERGER
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

WASHINGTON, D.C. — The White House's proposed Middle East free trade zone is meant to help Arab and Muslim nations develop economically, while improving the U.S. image in the region.

But many experts say it's a hollow gesture that actually will bring little benefit to the countries involved. U.S. President George W. Bush introduced the plan last week, calling for a free trade zone – which would include Israel – within a decade, and offering tools for Arab countries to modernize and benefit from international trade.

"The Arab world has a great cultural tradition, but is largely missing out on the economic progress of our time," Bush said in a May 9 commencement address at the University of South Carolina. "Across the globe, free markets and trade have helped defeat poverty and taught men and women the habits of liberty."

Many say it will bring little benefit to region

Bush proposes helping Middle Eastern nations join the World Trade Organization, create bilateral treaties and trade agreements and generate capital and jobs.

As part of the plan, the United States would work with countries in the region to improve the transparency of their finances, improve education and reform their judicial systems. To that end, U.S. Supreme Court Justice Sandra Day O'Connor is helping to organize a forum on judicial reform, to be held in Bahrain.

Bush's announcement is seen as another gesture to rehabilitate the image of the United States in the Arab world, which has been damaged by U.S. support for Israel and the U.S.-led war against Iraq.

It follows on the heels of the Middle East Partnership Initiative, announced late last year, which uses American funds to expand economic, political and educational opportunities in Arab states as a means of promoting democracy.

Some believe that a free trade zone could help make the Middle East, which lags behind other regions of the world in most economic criteria, more competitive.

For example, companies might be interested in transferring their textile and apparel operations from Asia to the Middle East if the regions were comparable in terms of skill level and stability, said Harold Luks, an international trade consultant in Washington, D.C.

The plan "has the opportunity to strengthen relations with the United States and help expose these countries to greater American investment and trade," Luks said. But he cautioned that the program should have modest objectives.

While the vision seems promising – and conforms to the U.S. perception that the region needs structural reforms far broader than a solution to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict – analysts say it suffers from political and logistical problems.

Politically, they say, it's too small a gesture, with a goal too far in the future, to win the United States much support in the Middle East.

As well, analysts say, eliminating trade barriers for Middle Eastern countries will do little if there isn't much in those countries to trade.

Jon Alterman, director of the Middle East program at the Center for Strategic and International Studies, described the free trade zone plan as a "Trojan carrot."

"It's a useful component in a much broader and active plan" to revitalize the Middle East economically and politically, he said, "but we don't see the active plan."

Two of the countries expected to benefit from the proposal – Egypt and Jordan – already have trade arrangements with the United States and Israel.

And it may be unrealistic to believe that many other states will be able to meet – or are interested in meeting – WTO standards, such as transparency and open access to markets.

Jordan, for example, needed to make vast reforms before it could sign a free trade agreement with the United States, in 1997 (it was passed by the U.S. Senate in 2000).

"Trade obstacles in the Middle East often exist for a reason," Alterman said. "Either the government makes a significant amount from the tariffs, or middlemen make money clearing away obstacles, which gets filtered back to the government."

The benefits states could receive from the plan may not be enough to motivate Arab regimes to open up their societies, said Stephen Cohen, national scholar of the Israel Policy Forum.

That's especially true in countries whose leaders might not be around a decade from now, such as Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak or Saudi Crown Prince Abdullah.

Nimrod Raphaeli, a senior analyst in economic affairs for the Middle East Media Research Institute, said the biggest obstacle to the plan is more logistical – the fact that the Arab and Muslim world simply has few products to trade.

"To have a meaningful free trade agreement, you must be able to sell and buy," Raphaeli said. "In practice, there is little the Middle East can export to the United States."

The one major exception is oil, but the United States already imports oil from the region.

Manufactured goods comprise only about 6 to 12 per cent of Arab countries' gross domestic products, and Arab states do only limited trading among themselves, Raphaeli noted.

The U.S. free trade agreement with Israel, which dates to 1985, has borne more fruit because Israel has a larger manufacturing sector than the Arab states, he said.

Britain to debate ban on Jewish slaughter methods

Ha'aretz Daily Newspapers Ltd.

JERUSALEM — The British government will discuss next month a total ban on Jewish and Muslim ritual slaughter in a move expected to anger thousands, the London Times reported last week.

Under European Union animal welfare regulations, all farm animals must be stunned before slaughter, unless they are killed by religious methods, the Times said. According to Jewish and Muslim religious law, the animal's neck is slit and left to bleed to death.

Though some Muslim slaughterhouses allow the use of electric stunners, Jewish law is less flexible and shocking the animal first is not allowed.

The Times reported that a four-year study by the Farm Animal Welfare Council, which is appointed and funded by the British government, has concluded that Jewish and Muslim slaughter methods are inhumane.

The panel is insisting the slaughter methods meet mainstream regulations. According to the Times, negotiations between the council and Jewish and Muslim religious groups have broken down. The Campaign for the Protection of Shechita (the Jewish slaughter method), the newspaper says, has called the council one of the most "stubborn repositories of institutionalized religious prejudice in this country."

But a council source told the paper that "if modern slaughter methods can avoid suffering, it is not unreasonable for religious leaders to reconsider their position."

Research by members of the council found that cows and poultry take up to two minutes to lose consciousness after their throats are cut, while for sheep it is between 14 and 70 seconds.

Neville Nagler, director-general of the Board of Deputies of British Jews, said, "Pre-stunning is against our very long-standing religious principles. There would be a very serious outcry at interference in what has been a fundamental religious rite for thousands of years."

The Jewish method of slaughter is already prohibited by Switzerland, Norway, Sweden and the Netherlands. In France, only the Jewish umbrella group CRIF is permitted to slaughter animals. In a compromise that was reached in the Netherlands last year, Jews are allowed to slaughter bulls, but only SpaMedica at 66 Avenue Rd. is now doing one of the most innovative procedures in Toronto. It is called Thermal Lift and the results are remarkable.

A high-frequency electrical current penetrates the first layer of skin, leaving it completely undamaged while stimulating the collagen to create a skin-tightening effect.

"The outcome lasts for about three to four years," says Dr. Steve Mulholland, medical director of SpaMedica. A local anesthetic and intravenous sedation are administered so that there is no pain, and the whole procedure takes about one hour. There is really very little down time. Mulholland says you can go out that same night.

The lift and tightening effect occurs over the next three to four months. This is a great way to get your face lifted and smoothed without a knife. The results are not as dramatic but certainly excellent. New technology never ceases to amaze me!

Pastels and bold shades are hot this summer. Lots of slippery shine on the lips with eyes full of colour and very dramatic. Have fun with summer palettes that frolic with an exotic essence. One word of advice: protect your skin with sun block, especially if you are outside a lot.

Ombrelle SPF 45 SPF is superior sun protection for the palest of skin and claims to block up to 98 per cent of skin damaging UV rays.

For a great self-tan, try Estee Lauder's latest Go Tan Sunless Towelettes for face and body. They are easy to use, as the towelettes are a non-woven fabric to uniformly release the tanner to your skin seamlessly.

Did you know that the Terry Ritcey Hair Salon (122A Yorkville Ave.) is now offering Kerastase Paris, along with a host of other great hair products.

This line of products is terrific and not easy to access. Some say it is like a miracle for certain types of hair. Tuula Hanninen, receptionist at the busy salon, raves about the Kerastase Rituel Restructurant, an in-salon express treatment for even the most processed and damaged hair. The difference is immediate – almost like magic.

CAROL'S TIPS

SKIN CARE: Chanel's Precision Line has developed five high-performance anti-pollution cleansers. These cleansers not only remove impurities and all makeup, they strengthen the skin's defences against the damaging action of pollutants. Chanel also presents three new products in their Rectifiance Intense Collection. These wonders are designed to stop the hands of time, give your skin maximum hydration and reinforce your skin's natural defence system.

Neo strata's Up-Lifting family introduces the firming eye contour cream with kigeline and tensol to help lift and tone. It also contains caffeine to reduce puffiness.

Chanel's Precision Line.

Almay's Face and Eye Makeup Remover pads remove all makeup with no irritation or mess – they are an outstanding little traveller!

In five short minutes, Clinique's new Anti-Gravity Firming Lift Mask promises a grab and pull tightening effect, giving slack skin an instant lifting sensation.

Vichy unveils Novadiol, rich in stimulating soya extract to help restore skin's plumpness and tautness – very good for menopausal skin.

A new night treatment from Dior is really quite engaging. The concentrate combines the whitening S.N.O.W. Complex and the brightening Edelweiss Complex with Retinol-Oxasom. This unique combination will help fight age spots and pigmentation flaws, leaving your skin looking brighter and more flawless.

Carita treats us with five new body care products. Renovating Mineral Power provides the cells with all the mineral and trace elements to retain cell vitality. The other products are equally sensational – check them out.

New products from Carita Paris.

Lancaster introduces Aquamilk Beyond Moisture Essence, a milky intensive concentrated serum with an ultra-light texture. It is high-performance and perfect for all thirsty skins.

One of Orlane's newest products is B21 Balancing Mask, created to complete their B21 Purete collection. The mask counteracts the problems of mature, oily and combination skin and also contains firming ingredients for an uplifting effect.

Another winner from Chanel's Precision line is Eye Patch Total. It's an anti-fatigue line-smoother that boosts the radiance of the eye area and reduces puffiness and dark circles – great after a late night or a long flight.

One of the first "wonder sprays" for bust and décolleté from Christian Dior is available this summer. Its name is Bikini Top, and it promises to revitalize and refirm your bust.

FOUNDATION: The Flower Power collection from Lise Watier treats us with a really terrific portfolio for dark skin. And is it ever handy! If you do get some colour this summer, you can just blend up any shade.

A must-have this season is Clinique's Airbrush Concealer available in two friendly shades. It will camouflage just about anything on your face, such as dark circles, brown spots, red spots.

Chanel's new colours Pink Mink and Angora are definite must-haves.

NARS' tones this season include shimmering pink and teal – quite the combo.

Splashproof, new products from MAC include fabulous coloured pencils and a few mascaras that will withstand the summer heat.

HAIR: Redken, 5th Avenue NYC, introduces four fabulous new products – two shampoos with complimentary conditioners, All Soft and Extreme, both claiming to make your hair soft as silk, no matter how dry, brittle or distressed your hair might be Their latest Lush Whip is a great styling cream that is light-weight and does the job without making your hair heavy.

Lancaster's Rouge Grace comes in 20 pure and ardent shades that are simply spectacular.

Almost 20 years after its initial launch, a still-favourite line gets a new update! Its name is Studio Line from L'Oreal Paris. Among some 15 formulas available are great styling gels, fixing sprays and non-aerosol managing spritzes.

To take away the frizzies try Oleo Relax Nutri-Huile from Kerastase Paris.

The news from Terry Ritcey hair salon sounds to me like sensuous hair is on its way for summer. Senior Stylist Greg Kreutzer thinks bangs are back, but with a chunky separation to achieve a more modern movement and texture.

Kreutzer finds Redken's Rough Paste Working Material to be perfect for the look. Also big this year are hair extensions and the salon is pleased to announce that they are certified as official practitioners of the Great Lengths Hair Extension system. Free consultations are available.

Shaggy, layered hair, slightly unstructured and easy to manage, will be another really popular look for summer, says stylist Eduarda Jacob. However, even though it looks unstructured, each effect is carefully planned. Jacob recommends Sap Moss Styling Spray from Aveda for this special look.

To enhance these fabulous hair styles, Jeff Jager, head colour technician, says tone on tone will be the most popular colour technique this summer. Café au lait, Irish cream shades of blonde and soft suedy browns will be among the hottest shades – perfectly sensuous for those warm balmy nights.

The fashionista disease

By RANDI BERGMAN
Special to The CJN

If you constantly find yourself making room in an ever-shrinking closet or not having enough money to take a 20-dollar bill out of your bank account, chances are you are suffering from the common disease of obsessive-compulsive shopping.

Whether it's high-heeled pumps or cute purses, every woman has a penchant for something. Something about these accessories makes them so irresistible that you simply cannot bear to leave them on the store shelf.

Some may call it infatuation – even compulsion – but these purchases are merely the fashionista's version of collecting stamps or postcards.

Every girl has the right to treat herself to what she loves most. Shopping can be just what the doctor ordered for even the worst of problems. "Shopping therapy," as some like to call it, can be extremely effective, especially when you buy accessories, which, unlike clothing, lend themselves to all sorts of situations.

After all, you can never feel too fat for shoes, or too pale for a great new purse.

Though the purchases may seem superfluous at the time, this type of shopping is in fact economical. When you don't have enough cash to splurge on an entire outfit, a little purse, hat, belt or scarf can do just the trick.

There will always be a time, no matter how rare, to wear those hot pink mules from last season, or that purse made out of paper.

Personally, I know this compulsive behaviour quite well. My closet overflows with so many multi-coloured purses that I often forget my most imperative items in the purse I used the day before. And much to my mother's dismay, my shoes have far surpassed my allotted space in the front hall.

But I don't feel guilty. This disease of obsessive-compulsive shopping has hit the majority of the female population.

I say we are doing quite an admirable thing. While bettering the Canadian economy, we are also bettering the views of others. And for this, we should receive a reward.

On that note, they're having sales at Yorkdale…

Lachan choir to perform Japanese/Jewish music

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Japanese/Jewish music and a composition by a 14-year-old will highlight Our Prophets Proclaim: Musical Visions of Israel, at the Isabel Bader Theatre, 93 Charles St. W., on May 27 at 8 p.m.

In their repertoire, Lachan: The Toronto Jewish Chamber Choir, will feature A'irah Shachar (I Will Wake Up the Dawn), music written and first performed in Hebrew by the Shinonome Chorus (Makbetat Hashachar) of Japan.

The Shinonome choir is part of a Japanese religious movement called Beit Shalom--House of Peace or Japan Christian Friends of Israel.

Its followers are Christians who recognize Jews as the chosen people. Their mission is to pray for the Jewish people, peace in Jerusalem, and the coming of the Messiah. Many of their followers display a Magen David outside their homes.

Lachan was founded 10 years ago and has performed internationally. They were the national semi-finalists of CBC's choral competition in 2002.

"I believe that music is a powerful outreach tool to foster understanding and compassion among people," says the evening's conductor and musical director Cantor Benjamin Maissner.

Up to Jerusalem, a composition by Cassandra Luftspring, 14, will premiere at the concert.

A student at Arts York at Unionville High School, Luftspring is a soloist with the Toronto Children's Chorus. She won the Applause Award from York Region District School Board and a silver medal from the Royal Conservatory of Music for highest marks in Ontario on Grade 7 piano examination in 2001.

The program will also include a salute to the landscape of Israel as well as classical and popular music by Steinberg, Finkelstein, Shemer, Aldema and others

Tickets are $20, seniors and students $15. Call 416-782-3214.

Photos depict Jewish scenes through the ages

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Photo artist May Karp uses her camera to trace, among other things, the history of Jewish Rome, beginning with the ancient community, which dates back to 161 BCE, when they came as ambassadors of Judah Maccabi.

Some 65 of Karp's photographs, including those taken in Rome, will be exhibited at the Moore Gallery, 80 Spadina Ave., Suite 404, May 22 to June 14.

In the show, titled Sequenza,which means "next" or "following" in Italian, Karp has included photographs taken in Italy, Spain, South America and North America.

"I was especially interested in the history of the Jews of Rome," she says. "My husband Fred and I chose Italy because we wanted to learn about the old part of Rome in depth."

The photo exhibition includes a preserved Jewish ghetto house in Rome, where the Ghetto was established in 1555.

"Jews of the ghetto in Rome were allowed to leave during the day but had to wear Jewish insignias. They were allowed to sell used clothing and they were moneylenders, the only two professions Jews were permitted."

While in Rome to take the photos, Karp says, they spoke Yiddish to people on the street.

There are now 16,000 Jews living in Rome and the surrounding areas, she adds.

The diversified exhibition also includes scenes in Barcelona and Bilbao, which boasts the Guggenheim Museum designed by Frank Gehry.

"Mr. Gehry's design of the titanium skin design on the outside of the museum," she says, "originates with the scales of the carp fish his grandmother used to keep in the tub of her home in Toronto to be made into gefilte fish for the Sabbath."

She says she tries to establish a larger vision "by transcending boundaries and cultural divides while creating memorable images."

She uses a technique known as the Sabbatier effect. "These render a painterly quality to my photographs and express a tension between the past and what might happen sequenza – next."

This is Karp's third solo exhibition at the Moore Gallery. As in the past when she donated part of her exhibited photographs to the Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care and the Mount Sinai Hospital, Karp will donate some of the photographs from the Sequenza exhibit to the Breast Cancer Clinic at the Princess Margaret Hospital.

There are already 23 of her photographs at Princess Margaret Hospital, and her work is found in private collections throughout the world.

Exhibit reveals podiatrist's celebrity foot fetish

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

He articulates the names with familiarity – espadrilles, Dolce and Gabbana, Skechers.

For those of us not in the know, these are types of shoes and podiatrist Hartley Miltchin, a collector of celebrity footwear, recently brought his obsession out of the closet and into the Bata Shoe Museum, where they are currently on display in the exhibit Starstruck!

Marilyn Monroe wore her shoes to death.

About five years ago, Miltchin started his collection with a pair of Michael Jordan's size 12 sneakers signed by the entire Chicago Bulls team. After that, he was off and running, so to speak.

His collection now includes, to name but a few, a pair of Pamela Anderson's custom-made pink and shiny boots, Shania Twain's 1999 stage shoes and Shaquille O'Neal's runners – size 23, by the way.

Miltchin has a story to go with each shoe.

Elvis Presley's black leather cowboy boots, for instance, were worn in three of his early movies.

"They're very well used," Miltchin says, noting that Elvis' style set the stage for the footwear worn later by The Beatles.

One of John Lennon's black ankle boots is also on display – and also well-worn. According to Miltchin, Lennon's boots have an even wear-pattern, indicating that the famous musical leader of the 1960s peace movement "probably didn't have any imbalances."

Hollywood diva Marilyn Monroe wore her shoes to death, with a lot of "pressure down on the balls of her feet," Miltchin says. Lucille Ball wore junk, and her foot rolled into the big toe, while Elizabeth Taylor wore the soles out of her silver stiletto sandals.

"Madonna's shoes scream 'Madonna,'" Miltchin says as he pulls a pair of sandals out of his tote bag. They have a 90 degree slope and a heel that goes on forever.

"The everyday person just doesn't wear shoes like these," he says.

Rapper Eminem's Nikes are on display, complete with a "Slim Shady" signature. Apparently Eminem never signs anything with his real name. He uses his alter ego instead.

Displayed under plexiglass are Britney Spears' Skechers – a line of shoes she endorsed when she was still a Disney Mouseketeer. NSync's Justin Timberlake's boot is also prominently featured. If you look closely, you can see his name carefully sewn in. Rumour has it he has a doting mother.

There is a size 7 Jimi Hendrix slipper that Miltchin bought from an old girlfriend with a drug habit, and a Davy Jones high-heeled shoe – apparently worn to compensate for his shortness – that is signed by all four Monkees.

The collection merges Miltchin's collection with those already owned by the Bata Shoe Museum's and displays them as if visitors have arrived at a celebrity party.

Buddy Holly's shoes are at the soirée, as are Fred Astaire's – who had an imbalance near his big toe.

The exhibit also contains Micky Mantle's golf shoes (size 10), as well as Wayne Gretzky's skates, which Gretzky used for two seasons and were mistakenly given away by his dad to an auction.

"They were his favourite skates when he played for the Edmonton Oilers," Miltchin said. He got Gretzky's signature on them when his sports memorabilia dealer cornered The Great One in a sports bar two years ago.

Guides at the Bata Shoe Museum will tell you that much can be learned about a people and their culture by examining their footwear.

Indeed, those walking through the exhibit can't help but stop and wonder about Elton John's shopping shoes – high-heeled shiny runners with a "J" embossed on the side.

Miltchin, a Bathurst Manor native who grew up just a few blocks from where he now practises, loves all the shoes in the collection. For him, it's a fitting obsession for a podiatrist with sole.

Starstruck! is on display at the Bata Shoe Museum until Feb. 22, 2004.

Well-known Jerusalem-based artist David Moss was in Toronto for two weeks recently, running workshops at the Lipa Green Building for local Jewish artists and art teachers under the auspices of a cultural committee of UJA Federation.

Born in Ohio in 1946, Moss is known for reviving the art of the modern ketubah and for designing a magnificent Haggadah and many other Jewish works. His pieces have been displayed by many international art galleries, including the National Library of Canada in Ottawa, which possesses a facsimile of his Haggadah. The local artists who attended his workshops included "metal workers, conceptual artists, fabric artists, calligraphers and painters," Moss told Eye on Arts.

"We didn't actually create art, typically because I'm working with artists who already know how to do this," Moss said. "So I tried to help them with other aspects of their work – more creative aspects, and the Jewish connection. I try to help them to look at their work in more open ways, to expand their horizons, to explore new possibilities, to switch directions in their work or to do it in more engaging ways."

Moss returns to southern Ontario as scholar-in-residence at Camp Ramah in the Muskoka region for several weeks in July to work on projects with the kids and work with artists. Moss also works in a similar capacity with various Jewish communities in the United States.

Jewish Music at Distillery Jazz Fest: Jewish music is featured prominently at Toronto's Distillery Jazz Festival (May 22 to June 1) with performances of jazzy, klezmer and Israeli music by three different ensembles.

Shurum Burum by the David Buchbinder Ensemble mixes exuberant jazzy musical improvisations by 11 musicians with choreography and acrobatics of six circus and dance performers. Cointreau Cabaret, May 24 and 29, 9:30 p.m.

The Flying Bulgar Klezmer Band features six musicians on trumpet, bass, drums, clarinet, piano and vocals in a performance of authentic '30s music from the early days of klezmer, re-creating the Warsaw Ghetto of 1933. Cointreau Cabaret, May 31, 8 p.m.

The band Shakshuka produces meditative and driving grooves inspired by eastern and Israeli musical styles, blending features of Persian, Indian, Arabic, Spanish and western jazz music. Cointreau Cabaret, May 27, 11 p.m.

All events take place at the Distillery Historic District, Toronto's new centre for arts, culture and entertainment. Set on 13 acres in downtown Toronto (between Parliament and Cherry streets, south of Front Street), the former Gooderham and Worts Distillery dates back to 1832 and is the largest and best-preserved collection of Victorian industrial architecture in North America.

The jazz festival coincides with the grand opening of the Distillery Historic District on May 24 and 25. Tickets $10-$25. 416-872-1212. Web site: www.distilleryjazz.com.

British Prize: London-based writer Zadie Smith is not Jewish but her second and most recent novel, The Autograph Man, won the British Jewish Quarterly Wingate fiction prize in April because of its Jewish content, which includes some elements of the kabbalah.

As Smith explained recently to the London Jewish Chronicle, she grew up with many Jewish friends and found that her reading led her on a trail from Kafka to the Zohar. Although only 27, she sometimes speaks with a wisdom that belies her years – as when she explains why she doesn't generally like to give press interviews:

"It is precisely because I want to be a very great writer that I don't want to do anything else but write. Doing interviews, going on television, being in the papers, is all a waste of my time. I really do think writing is damaged by this kind of attention. You watch great writers become dissipated or get into difficulties because of it."

Jewish Film Festival leaves me with a pickle

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

Last week, some attendees of the Jewish Film Festival went home with a pickle. But only if they co-operated and left through the back doors of the Bloor Cinema, as instructed.

Before the mid-day matinée, while the audience rushed to unreserved spots, signs reminded viewers that it's not kosher to hog seats. Nonetheless a skirmish in Aisle 4 had to be settled because someone draped a coat over the chair in front in order to secure clear viewing. While this issue was being resolved, a man with a microphone – I believe it was the man holding the tray of pickles at the exit – went over the rules of movie etiquette, reminding the audience that talking, shushing and clucking during important parts is not allowed.

But some habits are hard to break. About five minutes into the movie, the woman sitting behind me informed no one in particular to watch carefully because a scary part was coming up; someone over at the side let us know when to expect the funny parts; the person to my right groaned over the leftist comments and the man to my left sighed every time the character who supported Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's viewpoint was heard.

During the intermission, I was told a long line had formed outside the men's washroom. Apparently, a group of women had commandeered the men's room because the wait for the women's was too long. The men patiently waited while a woman went in and out of the men's bathroom to report.

As she counted down to "four… three… two… one" woman left in the washroom, she flirted the crowd into compliance. After the restroom was finally returned to the men, several people commented that this was a great moment of co-operation for the Jewish people.

This collaborative effort was facilitated by the ubiquitous ushers who were on top of all disruptions. Headsets and walkie-talkies kept those in charge informed about all disturbances.

A man in Aisle 7 had to be reminded that telling everyone what happens at the end really isn't fair.

To which he promptly responded, "For fair, I would have gone to work. Instead I came to the Jewish Film Festival to unwind with mishpachah and watch films that sometimes touch my soul."

Artist explores the theme of love in her exhibition

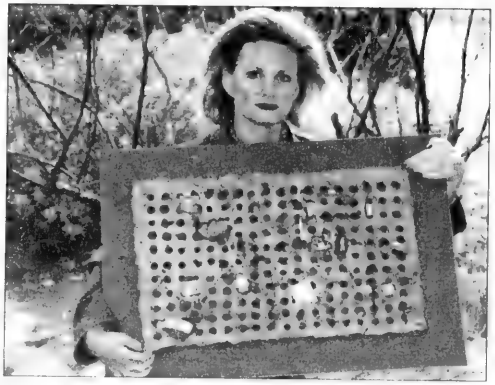
By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Love, and its many forms, is the theme of an exhibition of works by multi-faceted artist, Tootsie Halbert, at A Show of Hands Gallery at 1016 Eglinton Ave. W. through the month of June.

"Each expression of love is powerful and life affirming," says Halbert who has created large scale framed compositions for the show.

Halbert uses layered paper and mixed media to create the meaningful exhibition which reflects the depth of her artistic abilities.

For more than 40 years, Halbert has used many different media to express herself including, ceramics, jewelry, textiles, sculpting and painting.



Artist Tootsie Halbert is seen with her multi-media work titled, Wild Life. Halbert's artwork is on view at Show of Hands Gallery through the month of June.

"The most commonly identified forms of love are the love between husband and wife, parent and child, members of a cultural or faith community and country," she says.

Recently, Halbert created a work of art for an exhibition which was sent to Shanghai celebrating the life of former Chinese Consul General Dr. Feng Shan Ho, who helped save the lives of 20,000 Jews fleeing the Holocaust.

"I have also learned that love can also be found in acts of loving kindness between strangers, as the life and work of Dr. Ho demonstrated. All of these ties that bind are explored in the exhibit at the Show of Hands Gallery."

She adds that the inspiration for her art is drawn from people and nature "in all of their wondrous expressions. I strive to evoke the innocence of childhood, the pleasures of nature (perhaps influenced by growing up in Kirkland Lake), my own connections to Judaism as both a faith and culture, and the celebration of life in all of its diverse manifestations."

Halbert's pieces are to be studied. "You have to look at them carefully because everything in life is not on the surface."

Quiet hero rescued Jewish kids

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Almost 700 Czech Jewish children owe their lives to a diffident British stockbroker with a heart of gold.

Nicholas Winton, now 93, saved them on the eve of World War II.

His story is the subject of Nicky's Children, which CBC TV will broadcast on May 28 at 8 p.m.

The program is hosted and narrated by CBC correspondent Joe Schlesinger, who was rescued by Winton.

Winton, who was knighted recently by Queen Elizabeth, headed the British Refugee Committee, which cajoled Britain and Sweden into admitting 669 Jewish children from German-occupied Czechoslovakia.

Such was the temper of the times that no other countries would have them.

Never driven by ulterior motives, he was simply moved by the plight of Jews facing Nazi persecution.

This absorbing documentary unfolds through the medium of interviews with these "children" and archival footage.

Winton's altruism came to light by accident in 1988 when his wife Greta, stumbled upon an old scrapbook filled with the children's names, and letters from their parents.

Winton had never bothered telling his wife about his good deed. To him, it was just an "episode," "something that had happened" in the course of a long life.

For some strange reason, Nicky's Children does not mention the fact that Winton is half-Jewish. Perhaps his partial Jewish ancestry was a factor in his decision to help the children.

Be that as it may, the film covers considerable ground, fleshing out the historical context of the era and providing capsule sketches of several of the children.

To achieve his humanitarian objective, Winton had to convince the German authorities to release the children and the British and Swedish governments to accept them.

No naif, Winton was not above using forged British documents to fool the Germans into releasing the children.

From May to August 1939, Winton greeted eight train loads of children. The outbreak of hostilities in Europe forced the cancellation of a ninth transport. The kids who had been slated to board that train did not survive the war.

Many of the children were under the illusion they would be reunited with their parents. The reality was quite different. In the vast majority of cases, parents and offspring never saw each other again, the parents having been murdered during the Holocaust.

In a poignant recollection, Schlesinger recalls saying goodbye to his father in a smelly bathroom in a train station just across the border in Germany.

Jews were not allowed to set foot in the station's waiting room. Schlesinger did not see his father again. He perished in a death camp in Poland.

In Britain, Winton placed them in a variety of institutions ranging from foster homes to boarding schools.

In an interview, Winton explains he had no patience for myopic rabbis who objected to the placement of children in Christian homes. Sometimes there was no alternative.

Winton became something of a celebrity after his wife accidentally discovered his scrapbook in their attic.

He was invited to appear on a television show, not having been told that some of his "children" would be in the audience. In a moving scene, a woman leans over to hug him in a mutually tearful reunion.

As befits his status as a reporter, Schlesinger has the last word. Winton, he says tremulously, is one of the most decent people he has had the privilege of knowing. Schlesinger can pay no higher compliment to a fellow human being.

A quiet hero, Winton richly deserves the praise.

Event to raise funds for new cancer treatment

By ADAM SEGAL
Special to The CJN

Radiation may be a lifesaver for cancer patients, but its intense side effects can batter their bodies and minds.

But thanks to medical advancements, there are now new radiation treatments that target cancerous cells while minimizing damage to healthy cells.

Lisa Coristine has undergone several successful rounds of this new type of targeted radiation.

"I was fortunate," the 27-year-old teacher said. "This is not something that happens all the time."

Lisa's success and bravery inspired her family and friends to form the Brave Heart Foundation, which raises funds for targeted radiation at Princess Margaret Hospital.

The foundation will be throwing a fundraising "Life" party at the York Event Theatre at 101 Eglinton Ave. E., on May 23.

"[Life is] a very suitable theme because… hopefully, we can try and save lives," said Tammy Cohen, who is in charge of planning the affair.

Cohen said the party will include DJs and other entertainment, as well as a raffle for those who buy tickets in advance. She expects about 500 people to attend.

Coristine is thrilled the foundation is throwing the bash.

"It feels so good to know you are doing something," the Thornhill resident said. "One thing I knew when I [was diagnosed with cancer] was that I would put it to good use."

Lisa Coristine

Coristine's battle with the illness dates back to September 2000, when she began experiencing severe migraines.

By the summer of 2001, she lost her sense of smell and was sleeping 20 hours a day.

Doctors were baffled and so was Coristine.

"I thought I was burnt out from my first year of teaching," Coristine said.

By the time Coristine had an MRI in August 2001, a tumour in her sinuses had grown to 8.5 centimetres in length and was pushing against her brain.

She had surgery and underwent five weeks of a new kind of targeted radiation.

"Instead of going in blindly, this type of radiation is designed to only hit programmed areas," Coristine said.

"That is what the foundation is raising money for – cancer treatments that help minimize the damage to healthy cells."

The following summer, her doctor spotted some additional brain tumours, and Coristine was warned she could lose her eyesight and suffer other ailments.

But once again, she received targeted radiation and pulled through.

"It would be a beautiful world where patients could have a doctor say, 'Don't worry [about the side effects], we have this new, improved treatment.'"

Coristine is currently undergoing radiation for a tumour in her nostril, but she is upbeat. She credits family and friends, particularly her sister Jennifer Zelovitzky, her boyfriend Amir Sperling and friend Jackie Taitz, the trio who started the foundation, for her positive mindset.

"They keep up such a brave front," Coristine said.

"The fact these three people formed a foundation and I was the inspiration for it is an unbelievable feeling."

For tickets to the Life party, e-mail brave heartfoundation@hotmail.com.

The foundation is also planning a fundrais-

Five-year-old 'puts the squeeze on' at lemonade stand to help Heart and Stroke Foundation

On May 25, five-year-old Amanda Belzowski, one of the youngest supporters of the Heart and Stroke Foundation of Ontario, will put her heart into raising funds in support of cardiovascular health.

Amanda and her family are running their fifth annnual lemonade stand on Briancliff Drive (off Lawrence, west of Leslie, and across from Edwards Gardens).

To date, they have contributed almost $5,000 in lemonade stand proceeds to the foundation.

In addition to Amanda's lemonade, the Belzowskis will offer their customers some family entertainment including children's recording artist Markus, who will begin his performance at 2:15 p.m.

As part of this family outing, Kenton of the Twisted Ones will also be delighting young patrons with his balloon creations.

For the last few years, Amanda and her family have participated in the Becel Ride for Heart, and have raised almost $10,000 in support of the foundation's research into the root causes of heart disease and stroke.

Amanda's great-grandfather and her grandmother have each had an artificial aortic valve replacement.

The 16th Annual Becel Ride for Heart takes place on Sunday, June 1 at 7:15 a.m., with a separate in-line skating event beginning at 7:45 a.m.

The biggest one-day fundraising event for the Heart and Stroke Foundation of Ontario, this year's Becel Ride for Heart is expected to raise $1.45 million for life-saving heart and stroke research.

Registration for the Ride for Heart takes place up until the day of the event at various locations in GTA. Phone 416-486-RIDE--7433), and www.heartandstroke.ca/ridefor heart for information.

About Nutrition

By LISA WEINBERG

Q. I just had a bone density test and found out that I need to increase my calcium intake. I am not really a dairy lover. How can I maximize my intake without consuming a lot of dairy products?

A. If you are going to consume dairy products, choose yogurt over milk. Cup for cup it has more calcium. Calcium-enriched orange juice is also a great source. Each cup contains almost the same amount of calcium as a cup of milk and it is available in most grocery stores. If you can't get enough from food (three servings per day equalling approximately 1,000 mg) then you should try a supplement. I suggest a calcium magnesium combination in a 2 to 1 ratio. This type of supplement is available in most health food stores.

Q. My two-year-old loves tuna sandwiches and I am happy to make him this seemingly healthy lunch. I am concerned, however, about things I have heard recently about high levels of mercury in tuna. Is it safe for him to eat?

A. There is a concern about the type and portion of tuna eaten by young children, pregnant and nursing women, and women in their childbearing years. The concern is that high levels of mercury ingested may cause neurological or other problems. The fish that seem to contain the highest levels of mercury and should be eaten in a limited way are swordfish, shark, tilefish, king mackerel and fresh tuna.

With regard to tuna recommendations, first, light tuna contains approximately half the mercury of white tuna, and is therefore a much safer choice for young children. The most recent recommendations from the Centre for Science in The Public Interest limit children to 28 grams or 1 ounce per week of white tuna and 43 grams or approximately 2 ounces of light tuna if they weigh under 33 pounds. This increases to 85 grams or approximately 3 ounces of light tuna for children up to 49 pounds.

Fish that are low in mercury levels include flounder, haddock, farmed or wild salmon and farmed trout.

Iraqi Jewish refugee speaks out

By RACHEL EISENBERG
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

VIENNA — Jacob will proudly tell you he is one of the last Iraqi Jews from Baghdad. But he's very happy to have left what was his home for more than 50 years.

Jacob, who started his journey on Feb. 23 and travelled through other Arab countries, says he feels safe and relieved now that he has arrived in Europe.

For security reasons, his real name and whereabouts cannot be published.

When asked about the situation of Iraq's Jews now that Saddam Hussein has been deposed, Jacob is mildly optimistic.

"It will be better, but it will take a long time," he says.

He still fears for the Jewish community because it is hard being such a small minority in an Arab country, he adds.

There are believed to be approximately 35 Jews left in Iraq.

Jacob has not been in contact with them since the phone lines went down during the war in Iraq, though he has tried.

He is hopeful about his own future after having celebrated his first Passover since his own exodus.

A religious man, Jacob strongly believes that he was saved by the good deeds he did for the community, including bringing kosher meat to families who could not come to synagogue to pick them up. Jacob also made sure before he left to teach someone how to slaughter chickens and sheep in accordance with Jewish law.

"Mitzvot tatzil mi'mavet" he says – good deeds save one from death.

Jacob has an amulet that he carries in his pocket, one of the only religious articles he took on his flight out of Iraq.

Jacob had wanted to leave Iraq since 1977. However, the government told him that he could only get a passport after retirement, which would be granted after a minimum of 25 years of work.

Not wanting to leave illegally for fear of being caught, Jacob stayed, and finally got his passport after working for 32 years.

After the establishment of the State of Israel in 1948, all Jewish studies were forbidden in Iraq, but Jacob's parents taught him about Judaism, including how to read and write Hebrew.

He was very involved with the Jewish community, performing ritual slaughter, leading synagogue services and blowing the shofar on Rosh Hashanah.

"We used to bake our own matzot in a small mud oven. Two and a half kilos of flour was enough for one person for Pesach," he says.

He proudly speaks of the ancient Jewish prophets and leaders buried in Iraq, whose graves also have become holy sites for Muslims there.

Yet Jacob claims that only his close friends and neighbours knew he was Jewish. At work he went by a different name that was less conspicuously Jewish.

His caution was due to the sporadic persecution of Iraq's Jewish community.

In 1969, a few years after the Six-Day War, innocent Jews were falsely accused and hanged in a square in Baghdad.

Many Jews disappeared during 1972 and 1973 – and no one is sure what happened to them.

After leaving Baghdad Jacob hid with a farmer in another Arab country, under a false identity. He kept his Jewishness secret for fear of being killed, he says.

Jacob then was able to move on to Europe, where he celebrated Passover with the support of the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee.

He hopes to be granted refugee status soon in order to be able to join his family, who live in a different European country.

Ex-Anaheim pitcher comes back with Tampa

By ELI SHUPAK
Special to The CJN

Al Levine was presented with a 2002 World Series ring last weekend during his first trip to Anaheim since last October's championship victory.

It was no doubt a bittersweet experience for the Tampa Bay Devil Rays hurler, accepting the memento after being somewhat surprisingly left off the Angels' 25-man postseason roster last year.

While he watched the series as a bullpen cheerleader and joined in the champagne celebration after the Angels' game seven triumph over the San Francisco Giants (Levine was among those seen whooping it up on the cover of Sports Illustrated), he was well aware that his four-year stint with the organization was over.

He declined comment on the way he departed Anaheim, but his decision to return to Scottsdale, Ariz., for the closing of his new home instead of participating in the victory parade in Disneyland spoke volumes.

"It's an honour to have [a ring], and I was happy that we won," said Levine, following a 7-5 Tampa Bay win in Toronto last week that began a 12-game road trip. "I was happy for the guys, but yet I didn't feel like I was part of the team.

"[The ring] is not something I'm going to wear. I'll give it to my son."

After officially being let go by Anaheim, the 6-3, 175-lb righthander was happy to sign a one-year deal with St. Louis, the defending National League central division champions.

But a nightmarish spring in which he yielded eight earned runs in just 10 innings pitched prompted the team to release him from their 40-man roster on March 26, prior to the guaranteed-contract deadline.

For Levine (pronounced Le-VINE), who turns 35 May 22, the move could have signalled the end of an eight-year career that also included stops in Texas and Chicago. He began his career as an 11th round pick of the White Sox in the 1991 free-agent draft.

The Park Ridge, Ill., native went home to spend time with his family in Arizona, uncertain whether he had a future in the game.

"You're never happy getting cut at the end of the spring, because it's tough finding a job," he said. "It made it even tougher especially after all the free agents that were out there this year.

Al Levine

"Sometimes it's not what you want, but it's for the best."

Levine, who went 4-4 with a 4.24 ERA and a career-high five saves in 52 appearances with Anaheim last year, was signed by Tampa Bay to a Triple-A contract on April 2. Slated to pitch in a simulated game a week later before reporting to the Durham Bulls, he was called up April 9 by the Devil Rays on an emergency basis and made an immediate impact with his new club.

That night, Levine came on in relief and picked up the win in a 10-7 triumph over Baltimore, pitching 2⅔ hitless innings. He credits hard work along with help from the coaching staff for the improvement in his throwing mechanics. He's been outstanding since, pitching primarily as one of the Devil Rays' set-up men for rookie closer Lance Carter.

Levine says he got shelled during the Grapefruit League as a result of doing some things wrong with his delivery and not "getting out there and throwing the ball."

Levine was 2-1 with a 1.65 ERA in nine appearances through May 13. He worked a season-high three innings against Baltimore on April 27, allowing just one man to reach base.

"He's done a real nice job and has been one of our more successful pitchers here early in the season," said Devil Rays manager Lou Piniella. "We need experience. We have a lot of young pitchers here, probably more than any team in baseball…he'll help stabilize things."

Berkovic: I may never play for Israel again

By ASHER GOLDBERG
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Manchester City midfielder Eyal Berkovic says he may not return to play for Israel's national team. "If I feel my injury prevents me from giving a 120 per cent effort then I will not play for Israel," he said last week.

Berkovic said the operation he underwent some two months ago for a stomach muscle injury helped him, but he said he still suffers from pain. After a period of recuperation, Berkovic will have another examination at the clinic in Munich where the operation was performed.

The midfielder is due to return to Manchester on June 2 and will begin training ten days before his teammates. Berkovic, who is currently in Israel, spoke recently with national team coach Avraham Grant and the two agreed that a decision on his future with the national team would be discussed only after he had resumed training with Manchester City.

In any event, Berkovic will not play in Israel's Euro 2004 qualifier against Slovenia on June 7 and is highly unlikely to play in the following match against Malta.

יעל זליגר

הילדה רובין הוד, מאת: נורית זרחי, הוצאת ספרית הפועלים

נורית זרחי, בתו של הסופר ישראל זרחי, ידועה בעיקר כמחברת ספרי ילדים. ברם, היא התפרסמה גם כסופרת למבוגרים וכמשוררת. גם כשהיצירות הן אישיות ואינטימיות, כמעט תמיד נחשפת אצל זרחי אספקלריה שדרכה משתקפת החברה הישראלית.

About Food

Dear Norene

By NORENE GILLETZ

This year, Yom Yerushalayim (Jerusalem Day) falls on May 29. A wonderful way to show your solidarity with Israel is by serving Israeli dishes to family and friends. Support Israel by thinking Israeli – enjoy hummus, falafel and pita bread. You can also serve grilled foods, otherwise known as mangal.

And don't forget about the coffee! Israelis love good coffee. In coffee houses, they like to drink it served in porcelain cups with a piece of oogah (cake). Israelis seem to find any excuse to have coffee, so I was intrigued to find a recipe for Israeli Coffee Chicken submitted to www.jewishfood-list.com from Nancy Berry of California. It comes from Jewish Cooking Secrets from Here and Far.

As a side dish for your Israeli-style dinner, serve this special noodle kugel, which was shared with members of the Jewish Food list by Maxine Wolfson of Rhode Island. She wrote: "Here's an easy and never-fail way to make what is a 'must' for shul kiddushes in Jerusalem – Kugel Yerushalmi. It's both sweet and sharp and is served with a slice of pickle."

KUGEL YERUSHALMI (JERUSALEM NOODLE KUGEL)

1 lb. thin noodles, not the thinnest
4 1/2 cups water
1 tbsp. salt
1 tbsp. black pepper
1/3 cup oil
1 cup sugar
4 eggs
1/4 package pareve margarine

Bring water, salt and pepper to a boil, add noodles and reduce to medium flame. Cook until water is absorbed.

In a small pot, heat oil and sugar; keep mixing until sugar liquefies and turns brown. Be careful not to burn. Then immediately, carefully, pour over cooked noodles and continue stirring until thoroughly blended. Mix in margarine. Let cool for a few minutes and then add eggs one at a time, mixing after each addition.

Bake in a greased casserole for 50 minutes or more at 325 until nicely browned. Serves 8.

ISRAEL COFFEE CHICKEN

1 large broiler-fryer chicken, cut up*
1/4 cup cold coffee
1/3 cup ketchup
3 tbsp. soy sauce
2 tbsp. freshly squeezed lemon juice
2 tbsp. wine vinegar
1 tbsp. olive oil
2 tbsp. brown sugar

Combine liquids and sugar and bring to a boil. Reduce heat and simmer 5 to 10 minutes.

Arrange chicken in baking dish. Pour sauce over chicken and bake at 350 for 1 hour. Turn and baste chicken every 15 minutes. Serves 4.

* I made it with 2 chickens using the same amount of sauce.

NDP Leader seeks Jewish vote

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

Jack Layton knows the New Democratic Party has disappointed – if not outright alienated – a good part of its traditional Jewish base due to its stance on Israel and the Palestinians and due to pointed statements made by its members. But the new NDP leader is confident that progressive voices in the community will continue their support.

In a recent wide-ranging interview with The CJN, Layton, a 53-year-old former Toronto city councillor and NDP stalwart who won the party's leadership last January, said he's aware of the chill that has descended between the political left and Jews worldwide when it comes to the Middle East. But he feels the damage can be contained and even reversed.

Jack Layton

"I think there has been some erosion [in relations], but I don't think it's as extensive as sometimes portrayed," Layton said. "I've opened up a lot of dialogue with progressive Jews in Canada mostly because I know a lot of them, primarily from working on issues in Toronto around housing and other issues.

"When I ran for leader, I spent a lot of time talking with progressive Jews as well as progressive Arabs, Palestinians and Muslims, working with people to develop a statement which would come as close as possible to [being] embraced by both. I thought that process was extremely important. Ultimately we produced a document that everyone was able to say we felt comfortable with. It's not perfect, but it has a fair bit to recommend, and hopefully our approach to balancing the various perspectives will open the doors to our party moving forward."

The CJN intends to interview all the federal leaders

No sooner did Layton take the reins of the NDP, defeating longtime New Democrats like Bill Blaikie and Lorne Nystrom, than the party passed a resolution on the Israeli-Palestinian conflict at its biennial convention in Toronto. The measure was an endorsement of an earlier resolution passed by the Socialist International, the worldwide organization of socialist, social democratic and labour parties.

The News in Brief

CANADA

Celluloid Success

VANCOUVER — The Vancouver Jewish Film Festival continued a six-year growth trend this year, registering well over a 200 per cent increase over the festival's 1997 numbers. Attendance grew to more than 5,400 last year from an inaugural number of 1,700 and that trend was expected to continue this year. Organizers give credit to films such as Amen, Mother V, The Smile of Isaac and Poker Face for attracting younger, less affiliated people than other community events.

Honorary Degree

TORONTO — Yeshiva University presented Toronto community activist Julia Koschitzky with an honorary doctorate at its 72nd annual commencement last week. Koschitzky, who has served in a variety of senior community positions, currently chairs both the Now Israel Consortium and the Israel advocacy committee of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto.

Schools defaced

MONTREAL — Two Jewish schools in Montreal were defaced with graffiti last week. Staff at the United Talmud Torah and its adjoining high school, Herzliah, removed the slogans, which included the words "Free Palestine" and obscene references to Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon.

ISRAEL

Adopting Settlers

JERUSALEM — A Christian evangelical group is "adopting" Israeli settlers in the West Bank and Gaza. The Jerusalem Prayer Team plans to send $55 (US) to each of 14,000 settlers. The group, which includes Rev. Pat Robertson, opposes the U.S.-backed "road map" for peace. "We do not support the road map, as the Bible is our road map," the group said in a statement.

WORLD

Shul Reopens

KIEV — A major synagogue in Ukraine has officially reopened after years of renovation. The Bet Menachem Great Choral Synagogue, now named after the late Lubavitch rebbe, Menachem Mendel Schneerson, reopened at a ceremony in the city of Kharkov. The largest shul in Europe when it was erected in 1913, it was nationalized by Soviet authorities 10 years later.

Backing off Bush

WASHINGTON, D.C. — A group of Jewish Democrats calling itself the Israel Policy Forum has asked Democratic U.S. presidential candidates to refrain from criticizing President George W. Bush as long as he works to implement the "road map" for peace. The group's statement is signed by Democrats such as actor Richard Dreyfuss, fundraiser Lynne Wasserman and Ruth Messinger, president of the American Jewish World Service.

McDonald's Settles

NEW YORK — Several Jewish groups are among 24 recipients of money from a $10-million (US) settlement with McDonald's over its use of animal fat in french fries and hash browns that were labelled vegetarian. Hillel and the Star-K organization will each get $300,000, the Jewish Community Centres Association will get $200,000, the Orthodox Union will get $150,000 and CLAL National Jewish Centre for Learning and Leadership will get $50,000. Another $1 million is earmarked for education about kosher laws, while $6 million will go to vegetarian groups, $2 million to Hindu or Sikh groups and some for groups that promote child nutrition.

Dana International

BUDAPEST — An Israeli transsexual singer highlighted an Israeli Independence Day celebration in Budapest. Dana International sang to some 3,000 people at the event, which was sponsored by the Jewish Agency for Israel. After the singer won the Eurovision song competition in 1999, she was feted by some Israelis and condemned by others.

Holocaust Restitution

BERLIN — Survivors of Nazi ghettos have until June 30 to apply for retroactive German pensions. Applications after June 30 will not be eligible for payments going back to 1997 but will be able to receive regular monthly payments going forward. A simple letter of application containing the name, age, place of birth, period of time in the ghetto and the type of work done, is sufficient. The letter should be sent to LVA Hamburg, Uberseering 10, 22297 Hamburg, Germany. Meanwhile, the International Commission on Holocaust Era Insurance Claims (ICHEIC) has published the names of 363,232 policy holders whose heirs may be eligible for compensation. The list is available on the ICHEIC Web site at www.icheic.org. Deadline to file claims is Sept. 30.

Polish Holocaust Heroine Saved Jews

LOS ANGELES — Irene Gut Opdyke, a native of Poland who agreed to serve as a German officer's mistress to save the lives of Jews during the Holocaust, died last week at 81.

In 1940, Opdyke befriended 12 Jews who were forced to work as dressmakers and tailors for the Nazis in Tarnopol, Poland. She hid them in the laundry room of a confiscated villa where she worked as a housekeeper for a German officer.

One day, the 70-year-old major discovered her secret and said he would keep it only if she became his mistress. Whenever Opdyke overheard Nazi plans to destroy Jewish ghettos, she warned residents. She also stole food and supplies that she would deliver to about 150 Polish partisans and Jews hiding in a nearby forest.

Opdyke's 1999 book, In My Hands: Memories of a Holocaust Survivor, is being made into a movie.

Opdyke, who lived in Yorba Linda, Calif., was named a Righteous Gentile by Yad Vashem and was presented with the Israel Medal of Honour, Israel's highest tribute. She also received a special commendation from the Vatican and her story is part of a permanent exhibit at the United States Holocaust Memorial Museum in Washington, D.C.

Camps get ready for West Nile virus

Campers will be asked to follow precautionary rules

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

Earlier this month, when parents thought SARS was under control and were beginning to sleep through the night, fears of West Nile virus returned.

West Nile was transported into Ontario in August 2001 by what experts believe is the Culex pipiens mosquito. According to the Ontario Ministry of Heath, in 2002, four people died from the virus itself and it's thought to have been a contributing factor in the deaths of 14 others.

Health authorities are assuring camp officials that with proper precautions, risks to campers are considered to be low.

However, camp directors say they are taking no chances. Most are currently holding education programs for staff and are busy repairing all physical barriers, such as screens and windows, to minimize the number of mosquitoes that can enter buildings and cabins.

Ellen Nash, director of Camp Northland-B'nai Brith in Haliburton, Ont., said staff members will participate in pre-camp training sessions so they can learn to protect themselves and campers.

"Statistically, children under the age of 10 are at least risk," Nash said, noting the importance of educating older campers and counsellors in the proper use of insect repellents – for their own protection and so they can be role models for younger campers.

The more serious complications associated with West Nile, such as encephalitis, occur in only one per cent of cases and mainly affect those people with a compromised immune system, she said.

According the Ministry of Health, some early signs of West Nile may be similar to flu symptoms. They include: fever, muscle weakness, stiff neck, confusion, severe headache, sensitivity to light, and extreme swelling or infection at the site of the mosquito bite.

Nash, who met with Ontario's commissioner of public health, Colin D'Cunha, at a recent gathering of camp directors, said the West Nile-carrying mosquito does not seem to be prevalent in the Haliburton/Muskoka area.

"The problem is more common in Toronto and urban areas, because West Nile mosquitoes don't tend to breed in large open ponds," Nash said, adding that she is just as worried about long-term dangers associated with too much sun exposure and will be ensuring that campers continue to apply sunscreen.

To fight West Nile, Nash said campers will be asked to follow precautionary rules. For example, at dawn and dusk, staff and campers will be told to put on light-coloured long-sleeved shirts and full-length pants – since the mosquitoes are said to be attracted to darker colours – and to apply insect repellent.

Campers will be instructed to apply sunscreen to their skin during the day and spray repellent on their clothing and hair and hairline at night, Nash said.

Malka Klein of Canadian Young Judea's Camp Shalom, located in Gravenhurst, Ont., said that more than 250 concerned parents attended a recent West Nile virus information evening.

Even though "health officials are reporting that chances of West Nile travelling north of Barrie are very slim," preventative measures are being undertaken and educational programs are underway, Klein said.

The camp is currently eliminating standing water locations, such as in eavestroughs, and treating stagnant water with pellets of the insecticide Bacillus thuringiensis Israeliensis (BTI), which Klein said are being recommended by municipalities and the Ontario Camping Association.

'My son's only wish is to speak again.'

Like other disabled veterans and victims of terror, Rotem Langer's life has been changed permanently as the fight for freedom continues and as Israel's very existence is being threatened.

Doctors did not give Rotem Langer, a parachutist soldier, any hope for survival. Langer was among the most critically injured during operation "Chomat-Magen". He was attacked by terrorists while stationed in Nablus.

Shot by a Palestinian sniper, a bullet entered Rotem's hand, traveling through his body and tearing apart numerous vital organs, causing hemorrhaging. Shrapnel accumulated around his spine. As Rotem turned around to shoot the terrorist, he received a second bullet in his neck — ripping his left artery, which carries blood to the brain. This stopped the supply of oxygen to the brain, causing Rotem to lose his ability to speak.

"During recovery, Rotem's inner brain pressure increased," recalls his father, Ze'ev. "In order to prevent further deterioration, doctors removed Rotem's scalp bone and stored it in deep-freezing; if he wants, it can be reattached in the future. At present, Rotem's brain is partially exposed, forcing him to be very careful and pre-meditate every move."

One year later, Rotem is working very hard toward his rehabilitation. On his behalf, Rotem's father says, "The only wish he has is to be able to speak again." When asked what he dreams, Rotem answers in single words and many movements, that in his dreams he is able to speak.

Rotem uses the fitness facilities at Beit Halochem in Tel Aviv to develop his body and weak right hand and arm. His treatment includes physiotherapy, speech and occupational therapy. In summer he appears at the swimming pool in a bathing suit, revealing many body scars. These are heroic scars. Rotem is our hero.

PLEASE ASSIST the more than 50,000 disabled war veterans and victims of terror who turn to Beit Halochem to help them in their recovery.

A memoir of faith in war

From the editor's desk

Last week I wrote about a conversation I had in Israel with a remarkable man, Rabbi Haim Sabato, the rosh yeshiva of Yeshivat Birkat Moshe in Ma'aleh Adumim.

Rav Sabato is the author of Adjusting Sights (Toby Press), translated by Hillel Halkin. Originally published in 2002 in Hebrew as Tiyum Kavanot, the book as won two literary prizes in Israel, the Sapir and the Sadeh awards. It has been widely acclaimed by literary critics and scholars, and it has captured the imagination of the Israeli reading public from all walks of life.

The story recounts the fearsome first days of the Yom Kippur War in 1973 and the subsequent service of the author as a gunner in a tank crew on the Golan Heights. It is written reflectively, retrospectively, part diary, part narrative, but always in a captivating minimalist style that is at turns lyrical and explosive.

The heart-rending drama unfolds from the very first few lines of the tale, as it weaves liturgical and biblical references into a suspenseful, powerful narrative. Rav Sabato seamlessly incorporates traditional Jewish sources into the story in a manner reminiscent of Israeli Nobel laureate S.Y. Agnon. Many observers have commented upon that fact.

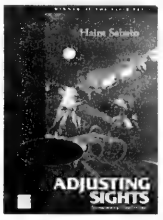
In a review of Adjusting Sights that appeared in the Jerusalem Post, Prof. Avi Amzalleg, a scholar of musicology and literature at the University of Haifa and Ben-Gurion University, was quoted as saying that Rav Sabato is "one of the best writers of this generation.

"Many authors today do not relate the Israeli experience in a language that comes from a place of Jewish roots," Amzalleg observed. "This book interests me because of its depth, because it's the language of the Mishnah, because it reminds me of the ideology of Jewish Spain and the idioms of Sephardi Jews and because it describes the modern Israeli experience using the ancient Mishnaic language."

It is precisely because Adjusting Sights describes the "modern Israeli experience" that it has become so popular in Israel and that readers from all backgrounds hear within its pages echoes of their own thoughts, fears and aspirations.

Rav Sabato told The CJN that the book virtually erupted from his soul one evening as he sat down at the computer. "I shut my eyes to recall that very first night when we went to war, after Yom Kippur. Then the soul did its own work. I did not have to assist it."

Into Rav Sabato's soul has been poured the rich essences of classical Jewish sources, Israeli literature and the canons of western, European and especially French literature. We, the readers, are the great beneficiaries, drinking in deeply the unique literary elixir that is his soul's divine product.



The title itself, "adjusting sights," is indicative of the clever, multi-layered imagination that permeates the work. It is a reference at the literal level to the periscopic sights connected to the gun turret from inside the tank. At the metaphorical level, it refers to the narrator's recurring need to adjust his sights as he tries to find and bless the new moon in the nighttime sky. It is also an even deeper metaphorical reference to the need of all human beings to adjust their sights when seeking God, when struggling with their faith during those awful moments of the most terrible and agonizing of human trials.

Adjusting Sights is an inspiring work.

This is the time of year, as spring rolls slowly, seductively, into summer and the school year drifts toward vacation, that communities throughout North America hold their solidarity marches on behalf of Israel.

The marches are exciting and wonderful things to behold and, better still, in which to take part.

In Montreal, Toronto, Ottawa and all across Canada, tens of thousands of individuals marched this year, side by side in large, festive throngs of friendship and fellowship, flags flying high, blue and white the predominant colours, to show their love for the cherished Jewish state.

Grandparents, parents, children and grandchildren; men and women; observant and non-observant; affiliated and unaffiliated; Jews of all backgrounds and ethnic origins; and non-Jews too – the sheer emotional force of the massive expression of support and goodwill on behalf of Israel sent chills up and down the spine.

We commend the organizers and the planners of so daunting a logistical feat. And we especially commend the people who formed the parade.

In the days ahead, as the hard-hearted fingers of accusation inevitably point at Israel, as international pressure upon the tiny state mounts, and as the sense of isolation from an unhearing world recurs, let us remember the feelings of unvanquishable strength and unflagging justice that animated our hearts and stirred our souls as we marched, sang and danced on behalf of Israel. For those feelings will have to fortify us, even as they encourage our kinfolk in Israel, when those difficult days come.

Baycrest touched by latest SARS outbreak

By DANIEL WOLGELERENTER
CJN Staff

Baycrest Centre has suspended all visits, admissions, transfers and discharges on part of the third floor of its hospital until June 4 after a patient who transferred there from North York General Hospital, the source of a new cluster of suspected SARS cases, began showing signs of the illness.

The man, who came to Baycrest May 15 and is now considered to be a probable SARS case, developed a fever around midnight last Friday and was transferred to an emergency ward at Humber River Regional Hospital the next morning, said Baycrest's director of public affairs, Nancy Webb.

As of Sunday night, Humber River Regional emergency room staff said, he was in isolation at the hospital's Church Street site, but hospital officials would not disclose his status.

The man was put on "precautions" last Friday at Baycrest, after news broke the previous day of a new outbreak linked to North York General. He was one of three new admissions to Baycrest who were placed under watch after recent stays at North York General and St. John's Rehabilitation Hospital, where the suspected outbreak appears to have spread, Webb said. When first put under watch at Baycrest, the man had a normal temperature and no SARS symptoms, she said.

Once identified, all three patients were immediately isolated in private rooms and began having their temperature taken regularly. As well, staff started using gloves and masks when dealing with them. As of Monday, neither of the other two patients had developed symptoms and were to have been taken off precautionary watch earlier this week, Webb said.

"There has been no exposure here. We have nobody else with SARS symptoms and no SARS cases, for sure," she said.

Although the probable SARS patient was on the west side of the hospital's third floor, the east side was temporarily affected by the freeze as a precaution. As well, patients who shared a room with the man have been placed in isolation. "Private companions" – some 500 people hired by individual families to visit and help care for patients – are still allowed onto the west side, though not to visit patients in isolation. But patients are not allowed to leave and are being told to stay in their rooms whenever possible, the centre's Web sites said.

"There is no change to services and no change to visiting rules, other than we're restricting access to 3-West," Webb said.

Visitors were asked to wear masks for a short time on Saturday morning "to make sure anyone who came into Baycrest was safe to be here – it had nothing to do with any increased risk at Baycrest," she said.

"While we are treating this as a probable SARS case, there was appropriate protection in place, which is essential in stopping any spread from this one patient," the centre said in one of the statements issued to update patients, family and staff. "By taking immediate action, Baycrest believes it has done everything possible to ensure there was no unprotected exposure [to the patient]."

As of Monday, Baycrest was still describing itself as SARS-free, defined by the Ontario Ministry of Health as a health-care facility with no known cases of SARS.

Nevertheless, Baycrest is advising that everyone who was on the third floor of the Baycrest Hospital after 7 p.m. last Wednesday, May 21, should take their temperature twice a day for 10 days. If they feel unwell, they are advised to isolate themselves at home and immediately contact their doctor and Toronto Public Health at 416-338-7600.

The Baycrest case came to light as health officials were investigating a cluster of new potential SARS cases in the Toronto area, which as of May 26 numbered 33, including a reported seven among health-care workers. The illness has killed 27 people in the GTA.

Before being touched by the latest outbreak, Baycrest had eased many of the restrictions put in place to keep the centre SARS-free. For instance, the approximately 800 hospital patients and residents at Baycrest's main complex on Bathurst Street are now allowed more than one visitor at a time, and those visitors, though screened, are not required to wear masks or have their temperature taken.

However, access is limited to one entrance on the west side of the main complex, and the centre is closed to all but family, clients, private companions and those with scheduled meetings.

Sol Matthews, who was at Baycrest Sunday to visit his 68-year-old sister in the Apotex Centre, Jewish Home for the Aged, said the centre was dealing with SARS "brilliantly, the best that I can imagine." But he added that he is "troubled" because the only way to control SARS is through isolation, and experts don't know for sure who actually has the disease, what causes it and how it is transferred.

Public health investigators think the latest SARS outbreak began at North York General, where a 96-year-old patient developed pneumonia and died after surgery for a broken pelvis. Officials now suspect the pneumonia was SARS, though its origin is unknown, and that it spread to a female patient, 90, who was transferred to St. John's and later died. A health-care worker who treated the woman at St. John's is now in critical condition with what is believed to be SARS. She spread the illness to two other patients and a visitor.

The Ontario Ministry of Health advises anyone who visited North York General between May 13 and May 23, St. John's between May 9 and May 20, St. Michael's Hospital's neurosurgery unit within 10 days prior to May 24, should isolate themselves, call public health and watch for the sudden onset of a fever greater than 38 degrees and such symptoms as cough, shortness of breath, or difficulty breathing.

Also, anyone who was at North York General between April 22 and May 12 or at St. John's between May 9 and May 20 should isolate themselves if they have symptoms of SARS and call Toronto Public Health for more information.

March against anti-Semitism set for June 8

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

A multi-faith collection of Jews, Christians, Hindus and Aboriginals will gather in downtown Toronto on June 8 in the second annual "march for humanity."

Sponsored by multi-faith coalition

Sponsored by a coalition of groups led by Canadians Against Anti-Semitism (CAS), the march is designed to "inspire Canadians to reclaim the pride imbedded in our traditions, and speak out against the spread of hatred threatening Canadian principles and our way of life."

The march will also serve as "a bridge to the non-Jewish grassroots, educate and promote awareness," said Sandra Stern, founder of CAS.

Six speakers will address the marchers, including Ontario Chief Justice Roy McMurtry, who will deliver the keynote address. Others scheduled to deliver remarks are Prof. Irwin Cotler, a parliamentarian who served as legal counsel to Nelson Mandela and Andrei Sakharov; David Mainse, host and executive producer of 100 Huntley Street on the Crossroads Television System; Charles McVety, president of Canada Christian College; MP Art Eggleton (Lib.) and MP Scott Reid (Canadian Alliance).

Participants will be entertained by a number of performers, including the Sai Children's Choir, the Tall Pines Singers, the Flying Bulgar Klezmer Band, gospel singer Jackie Richardson, and Cantor Benjamin Maissner.

"Although our focus is prejudice, we're doing it in an atmosphere of social harmony, communal harmony, and ending it on a hopeful note, because our hope is to make it better," Stern said.

Stern said she was inspired to create CAS and organize its first march in June 2002 due to her concern over a "growing world wide rise of anti-Semitism. To me it was reminiscent of the 1930s."

What's more, she said, much of the anti-Jewish hate was taking place "right in my backyard," with Canadian synagogues struck by arson and with visible Jews being roughed up in the streets of Montreal.

Last year's march attracted about 1,200 participants most of whom were non-Jews, Stern said.

Among the march's co-sponsors this year are the Canada Christian College, the League for Human Rights of B'nai Brith Canada and Christian-Jewish Dialogue of Toronto.

"Hopefully the march will demonstrate that Canadians will not and should not accept anti-Semitism." he added.

The march will began at 2:45 p.m. at Bloor Street and Avenue Road and head down University Avenue to Queen's Park.

BTI is an organic insecticide developed in 1977 in Israel and has been used around the world to combat disease-carrying mosquitoes.

Klein said Camp Shalom is also concerned about the health implications related to the inappropriate use of repellents and will be issuing staff guidelines.

"We are going to ensure that mosquito repellents be applied as a group with the supervision of older staff," she said.

In addition, Camp Shalom is currently building a wash station outside the dining hall and everyone will be asked to wash their hands before eating, she said.

Directors are recommending light coloured clothing and insect repellent with varying concentrations of the chemical DEET – up 10 per cent for younger children and up to 30 per cent for those 16 and older.

Since DEET, the ingredient used in many insect repellents applied to the skin, doesn't work well when applied together with sunscreen, the camp will implement a routine of applying sunscreen in the morning and repellent in the evening, Klein said.

Camp Shalom is not recommending that parents send candles or mosquito coils. They do not offer sufficient protection against mosquito bites and present fire risks, she said.

Larry Bell, director of Camp Robin Hood in Markham, Ont., said day camps should not be affected because mosquitoes are generally a dusk-to-dawn problem.

However, the camp will be vigilant, he said, especially around wooded areas and will be taking precautions during any overnight activities.

Andrew Levy, director of the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre's Centre Camp, said he has met with provincial health officials and is monitoring the situation.

Synagogue membership dispute goes to court

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Representatives of the Lodzer Centre Holocaust Congregation appeared in the Ontario Superior Court of Justice, civil division, last week, to defend the congregation's refusal to grant membership to the husband of a long-time member.

As the case began last Tuesday, plaintiffs Barbara Rotberg and her husband Allen Mayer testified about their "loss of social standing" and damage to their reputations stemming from a series of incidents following the Lodzer Centre Holocaust Congregation's rejection of Mayer's membership application.

The couple is suing the congregation, as well as board members Dorothy Tessis, Sarah Senior and David Rybowski.

Sidney Silver, president of the 175-family-member unaffiliated, Conservative-style congregation when Mayer and Rotberg married in May 2000, was also originally named as a defendant, but was dropped from the suit following his death more than a year ago, said the couple's lawyer, Jeffrey Silver (no relation to Sidney).

Mayer and Rotberg, whose late father Henry was a synagogue founder, are seeking $20,000 in damages as well as membership for Mayer, along with its privileges, including the right to be buried in one of the burial plots held by his wife.

Their position, according to their lawyer, is that Mayer, a 52-year-old accountant, "always was" a member of the synagogue.

The defendants deny the existence of any custom that would automatically permit him to become a member on marrying a synagogue member.

They also deny that their decision to reject Mayer's membership was arbitrary or made in bad faith. Their statement of defence cites several factors leading to denial of his membership application, including a letter from Mayer alleging that the board was in breach of its fiduciary duties, alleged rudeness on Mayer's part and a concern on the part of board members that he would "create friction within the synagogue."

The synagogue's lawyer, Arnold Zweig, has submitted a counterclaim requesting, among other things, damages of $50,000 and an order that Mayer refrain from communicating about the congregation with any third party, including the Canada Customs and Revenue Agency, the charitable branch of any Government organization and The Canadian Jewish News.

The case may be the first of its kind involving a synagogue in Canada, although there have been other cases involving churches, Silver said. A New Brunswick synagogue tried to expel an existing member in the 1920s, but the case was overturned in court, he added.

Attempts by Mayer to arrange a din Torah (rabbinical court) and, later, mediation, did not work out, Mayer testified.

An attempt by the parties involved to reach a settlement on the second day of the trial was not successful either.

Judge Abraham Mandel said in court that the trial would be "a lengthy and difficult case."

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Consultant on aging, photographer and writer Irene Borins Ash has been studying seniors for years.

"Some people become angry and envious as they age," says Borins Ash, who has a degree in social work from Yeshiva University. "Yet others choose to give their love, affection and wisdom to the world around them. When one offers love, this is what they themselves reap."

An exhibition of her photographs, titled Treasured Legacies, will be on display from Monday, June 2, to Friday, June 6, at the Toronto City Hall Rotunda, 100 Queen St. W., from 8 a.m. to 5 p.m. Borins Ash will be present at the exhibit.

The photographs of 41 seniors from different cultural and socio-economic backgrounds is sponsored by The Older Women's Network (OWN) as part of Seniors Month.

"I have observed throughout my years as a social worker and photographer that seniors do not need to become despondent and withdraw from society as they age," says Borins Ash. "Rather, they can make the years from 60 and beyond a time to evolve and lead a continually vital and productive life."

She says the people she has photographed are all living meaningful, vibrant lives in spite of losses and changes. Some of the subjects are well known and others are not. Included are world-renowned jazz pianist Oscar Peterson, entrepreneur and philanthropist Ed Mirvish, social activist and writer June Callwood, internationally acclaimed violinist Eugene Kash and many others.

Also featured are a homeless man, Fred Dunn, 80, who lives in the Rosedale ravine, a cancer survivor, a volunteer at Princess Margaret Hospital and others that Borins Ash says "show the beauty – physical, intellectual and spiritual – of age."

In addition to the photographs, the exhibit includes some of the subjects' thoughts and philosophies.

Borins Ash is currently writing a book based on the exhibit, which will feature more photos and more in depth information on the subjects. The book, which will be published under the same name by Margie Wolfe of Second Story Press, is scheduled for publication in December.

Amazing weight loss story

In the past, I have weighed as much as 200 pounds at three different times in my life. I have tried every diet on the planet.

For over 25 years I attended and paid for the Bernstein diet. I was able to lose weight, but I needed to diet every year, then twice a year. I thought I was successful because I lost weight BUT I could never maintain the weight loss. I can still remember the pain and frustration of gaining, within two years, the same weight back or more!

Now I am able to maintain my weight loss through Positive Changes Hypnosis. I am so grateful to this wonderful program. I am healthy physically, spiritually and mentally. I hesitate to claim that I have reinvented myself but I feel more confident and the program has helped me with my relationships with others, both in my personal life and at work.

BEFORE

AFTER

The most interesting and rewarding aspect of this for me is that I am learning how to learn. Learn in a different way, to be more creative with solutions.

I had heard of positive affirmations but never practiced using them myself. Now, I am. I enjoy today to the fullest and I am looking forward to a wonderful future.

CMDA revisited

Two weeks ago, this paper reported that Canadian Magen David Adom for Israel (CMDA) had resolved a dispute with Canada Customs and Revenue Agency (CCRA) that had threatened CMDA's status as a charitable organization under the Income Tax Act. The dispute has indeed been resolved; CMDA has retained its charitable status. But that is only part of the story. Important questions and unresolved issues remain as a result of the manner in which the dispute was resolved.

CMDA launched proceedings in the Federal Court of Appeal against CCRA's decision to revoke CMDA's charitable status. CCRA had alleged three grounds upon which CMDA had violated Canadian law, and thus forfeited the privilege of retaining its charitable status.

The first was that CCRA questioned the control and ownership arrangements for the ambulances. The second ground, relying in part on a CBC report, alleged that the ambulances were not always being used for medical purposes. The third, which was, in its entirety, a subjective interpretation and application of political statements, alleged that the mere use of the ambulances inside the "occupied territories," in and of itself, constituted a violation of Canadian public policy and that legally, any activity that offends public policy cannot be "charitable."

In September, in a vote of 2-1, the court upheld CCRA's notice to revoke the CMDA's charitable status. But it did so only on the basis of the first ground. The Court unanimously expressly rejected CCRA's spurious contentions regarding the two remaining grounds. "There is no Canadian public policy expressed in an Act of Parliament or in any publicly available government document that a Canadian charitable organization cannot operate in the occupied territories," the court unequivocally decided, stating there was no difference between providing medical services in Tel Aviv and providing them in the "occupied territories." Subsequent to the ruling, the CMDA filed leave with the Supreme Court to appeal the Court's decision. That request for leave to appeal, however, has now been withdrawn as a result of the agreement entered into between CMDA and CCRA.

Understandably, CMDA and its many supporters were pleased to remove the threat to the organization's charitable status. But there are urgent questions surrounding the language of the agreement and its implications that must be answered.

Did CMDA yield to CCRA's ill-intentioned desire to prohibit ambulances from operating inside the "occupied territories" by enshrining a provision to that effect in the agreement? If it did, can the agreement be renegotiated to remove the provision? If so worded, can that portion of the agreement stand? Is it enforceable in the face of the unequivocal ruling by the Federal Court of Appeal dismissing the CCRA's shaky assertion? If that restriction is in the agreement, why did the CCRA still insist on it, given the language of the court's ruling? These and other questions must be answered, before the community can consider this sorry matter truly resolved.

Mahmoud and Yasser

In your May 22 editorial, you state that "As long as the corrupt leader [Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat] is involved in PA decision-making, there will be no chance for peace between the Israelis and Palestinians" ("No chance if Arafat remains," CJN, May 22).

You also cite a Ha'aretz report and Israeli officials who believe that Arafat had prior knowledge of the orders given to a terror cell that departed from Arafat's compound in Ramallah on a mission that led to the murder of a 27-year-old Israeli from the West Bank community of Ahiya.

Arafat is here to stay. Mahmoud Abbas, the new Palestinian prime minister (and author of the Arabic The Other Side: the secret Relationship between Nazism and Zionism, which claims that less than a million Jews died in the Holocaust, victims of a Zionist-Nazi plot), says that Arafat is innocent of Israeli allegations that he has been involved in terrorist activities.

In a Toronto Star article "Bush works phone to sell his vision of Mideast peace" (May 21), Abbas is quoted as saying, "We say that Yasser Arafat is the legitimate leader who was elected to lead our way, and he is the president of Palestine."

Abbas, the Holocaust revisionist and former terrorist, is Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's Palestinian counterpart in the new "peace" plan. This plan calls for a quick (in two years' time) undoing of the history of the past half-century, removing all Jews from the "West Bank," sundering Jerusalem and deliberating on the right of return of the Palestinians, or more accurately, their right to overturn the state of Israel.

With the first terrorist actions in that new era, a traumatized world Jewish public will struggle to make sense of Israel's frightening new vulnerability. Across the table, Israel will listen to the further claims of Abbas and his partner Arafat, explaining why Israeli actions and attitudes are responsible for the ongoing murder of its people.

Must seek common ground

Marvin Maurer's letter about "ethnic cleansing" by Palestinians opposed to Israel's statehood turns history on its head ("'Ethnic cleansing' unacceptable," CJN, May 15).

First, Maurer denies the existence of any Palestinian "factions" that accept a two-state solution. What nonsense! On June 21, 2002, Sari Nusseibeh and some 650 others published a statement in the Arabic newspaper Al-Quds, supporting a plan "to live in peace side by side in two neighbouring countries."

Second, "population transfer" was part of Zionist thought as early as 1895. This may come as a shock, but Tom Segev unmasks it in One Palestine Complete, by citing documents and quoting, among others, David Ben Gurion, Theodor Herzl, Vladimir Jabotinsky, Arthur Ruppin, Joseph Sprinzak, Menachem Ussishkin, Chaim Weizmann. A Committee on Population Transfer was formed in the 1930s (its minutes are in the Central Zionist Archive in Jerusalem).

Third, many Israeli acts of "ethnic cleansing" took place during the 1948 War of Independence and the 1967 Six Day War. Doubters should read Meron Benvenisti's Sacred Landscape.

I support Israel's existence as a Jewish state, but I cannot be blind to the realities of its creation and ignore everything that might lead to a peaceful solution. Knowing what was done in our names helps us understand the Palestinians and find common ground between our peoples.

Send Queen's Park a message

The Jewish people are at a crossroads in Ontario. If all goes as the press reports, the provincial legislature will be dissolved and we will be going to the polls at the end of June. Another scenario has us voting in September.

This election will be fought on a number of fronts, but the most important issue facing the Jewish community is the continued existence of the Equality in Education Tax Credit (EETC) introduced in the dying days of the Mike Harris era and ultimately endorsed by Premier Ernie Eves. When the tax credit comes into force, it will provide a tax credit of 50 per cent of tuition (to a maximum of $3,500) paid by parents who send their children to Ontario private schools.

Meanwhile, provincial Liberal MP Dalton McGuinty has unequivocally stated many times that if he were elected premier, he would immediately dismantle the tax credit. McGuinty says this without providing any tangible replacement of this important relief to parents who wish to send their children to faith-based or other private schools in Ontario.

With tuitions at Jewish day schools at an all time high of more than $9,000 per student, the EETC is a welcome relief from the burdens of these skyrocketing costs.

Many people, including myself, have written to McGuinty and other Liberal MPPs, but there has been no response.

We must turn out for this upcoming election in the highest numbers possible to help ensure a legacy of Jewish education in Ontario. The funding of the schools of one religious denomination without equal funding for Jews, Sikhs, Muslims and others is discriminatory and must stop. We must send the message to Queen's Park and we must do it now.

Perspectives

No matter its origins, anti-Semitism needs to be fought

By HILLEL HALKIN

The following is an excerpt of a speech at a recent international conference in New York called Old Demons, New Debates: Anti-Semitism in the West. The conference, which brought together international scholars and journalists, was sponsored by the YIVO Institute for Jewish Research at the Center for Jewish History. This speech was provided to the Jewish Telegraphic Agency by the Center for Jewish History.

When we ask ourselves whether anti-Semitism is essentially one thing or many, just as when we ask ourselves whether or how it will cease – when we ask, in other words, what must change to make it cease – are we not really asking whether the real cause of anti-Semitism can be found in the Jews or in the world?

Hillel Halkin

Before anyone protests that even to inquire whether the Jews might be the cause of anti-Semitism is an abject capitulation to the anti-Semites, I would remind you that the belief that they are the cause of it has been traditionally shared by anti-Semites with Jews.

Why are the Jews like the fruit of the olive tree? ask the rabbis in the Midrash. "Because," they answer, "as all liquids mix with each other, but the oil of the olive does not, so Israel does not mix with the Gentiles… And as the olive does not yield its oil unless it is crushed, so Israel does not return to God unless it is crushed by affliction."

Being chosen and set apart exacts a double price. It makes an envious and indignant world persecute the Jews and it makes a pedagogical God allow this to happen.

Historically, this is the normative Jewish point of view. Classical Zionism, too, viewed the Jews as the cause of anti-Semitism.

Here is Leo Pinsker's Auto-Emancipation, published 14 years before Theodor Herzl's The Jewish State:

"Among the living nations of the earth the Jews occupy the position of a nation long since dead… If the fear of ghosts is something inborn, and has a certain justification in the psychic life of humanity, is it any wonder that it asserted itself powerfully at the sight of this dead and yet living nation?… The misfortunes of the Jews are due, above all, to their lack of desire for national independence."

Zionism understood the Jews' misfortunes differently from rabbinic Judaism, which made it more optimistic about overcoming them. And yet there is in all self-blame a peculiar sort of optimism that helps to explain why, starting with the biblical prophets, there has been so much of it among Jews; for if you are the cause of your own suffering, you have the ability to rectify it, as you do not if it is caused by something or someone outside you.

Imagine that, in its early years, Zionism had declared proudly and defiantly: "Do not blame the Jews! It is not their fault that they have become the scapegoats of a sick mankind, which has projected onto them, and will continue to project onto them, all its fears, hatreds and phobias."

Such a Zionism would also have had to say: "Because mankind will always have fears, hatred and phobias, there will always be anti-Semitism, which no Jewish state can put an end to. On the contrary: such a state will simply become anti-Semitism's new focus."

How many followers would a Herzl who said this have attracted? If anti-Semitism has a single cause – the Jews – it is a dragon that can be slain. If it has many causes – as many as the world has fears, hatreds and phobias – it is a hydra: cut off one head and it will grow another. Is that, then, what we are asking when we ask whether the new anti-Semitism is or is not just the old one all over again, whether we are fighting a dragon or a hydra?

Ruth Wisse

I have two friends who I wish were at this conference. They have thought more passionately about anti-Semitism than anyone else I know personally and they disagree about it so sharply that we've missed a chance to see some sparks fly by not having them.

They are the scholar and critic of Jewish literature Ruth Wisse and the novelist A.B. Yehoshua. Wisse rejects the notion that the Jews have caused anti-Semitism, except insofar, perhaps, as they have not been militant enough in combating it. Jewish self-blame, she thinks, is a habitual introjection of anti-Semitic attitudes that turns the anger of Jews inward at themselves rather than outward at their enemies.

Anti-Semitism is hydra-headed, and its latest form of hatred of Israel should be viewed not primarily as another round of "discrimination against Jews or even persecution of Jews," but as "a political instrument to oppose liberal democracy by harnessing ancient prejudice to brand-new fears." The battle for democracy – the one form of government under which Jews have always prospered – and the battle against "Israelophobia," Wisse argues in a book she now is writing, are one and the same, since Israel is "democracy's fighting front line."

Yehoshua is writing a book, too. In it he maintains that the ultimate reason for anti-Semitism is the Jews themselves. Although this does not, needless to say, excuse or justify prejudice against them, the Jews have throughout their history, Yehoshua believes, baffled and exasperated the world. They have done this by taking two ideas that were their contribution to civilization and by which civilization subsequently organized itself – the idea of monotheistic universalism and the idea of national particularism – and fusing them in a way that has subverted both, thus ironically making them in the world's eyes the symbolic enemy of humanity and of the nation alike.

A. B. Yehoshua

It is this fusion, or confusion, Yehoshua argues, that has enabled the Arab states to turn a political and territorial conflict with Israel into a successful anti-Semitic campaign, since Israel's failure to distinguish clearly between religion and nationality – that is, between Jewishness and Israeliness – makes it an anomaly among democracies and exposes it to charges of racism and discrimination.

I don't wish to comment in these brief remarks on the intrinsic merits of either Wisse's or Yehoshua's position, each of which draws on a broad hinterland of thought. I would merely point out that, if we ask ourselves the question put to this panel, "Has the sovereignty of Jews in the state of Israel and the flourishing of Jews in America permanently changed the context for the analysis of anti-Semitism," Wisse says, "Yes" and Yehoshua says, "No," while if we ask, "Do the Jews have the power to put an end to anti-Semitism," Wisse says, "No" and Yehoshua says, "Yes."

Yehoshua's "yes" is based on the conviction that, if Israel and Diaspora Jewry would pursue the Zionist revolution to its logical end, they would finally disentangle the Jewish confusion of religion and nationality that has rankled mankind for over 2,000 years, leaving us with two discrete identities – a Jewish religious one and an Israeli national one.

Since such a Judaism could no longer be suspected of supra-national allegiances and such an Israel could no longer be accused of undemocratic practices, one type of anti-Semitism would fade and – in the absence of a cause for another type – anti-Semitism would pass at last from the world. Wisse would object to this strongly. She would counter, I suppose, that Judaism without Jewish nationhood would not be Judaism, just as a non-Jewish Israel would not be Israel, and that Yehoshua's approach simply demonstrates the illusion of thinking that, short of disappearing themselves, the Jews can make anti-Semitism disappear.

We have, then, two opposed analyses. Yet, curiously, they converge on one belief, which is that a vigorously democratic Israel in an alliance of values and interests with democratic forces around the world is the best way of combating contemporary anti-Semitism. And while you needn't doubt that if they were at this conference, Wisse, who is on the political right, and Yehoshua, who is on the political left, would be fighting tooth-and-nail over just what such an Israel and such a Jewish politics entail, they would fully agree on the need for defending and promoting them.

This is encouraging. It suggests that, however differently we may answer the questions put to this panel, our operative conclusions may turn out to be similar. It is a little as if two oncologists, after arguing how and whether a new malignancy in a patient is related to a previous one, found themselves agreeing on the broad outlines of its treatment, if not on the specific drugs or techniques of surgery to be used. The history of medicine indeed tells us that successfully combating an illness need not depend on identifying its root cause.

"Why the Jews?" will go on being asked, not because the question is resolvable, or because we cannot act without answers to it, but because our anguish in the face of continued anti-Semitism makes us ask it. This anguish is especially great for those of us who have believed, and go on believing, that Zionism and Israel were the most appropriate and far-sighted of all Jewish responses to modernity, a heroic effort on the part of the Jewish people to rejoin the family of man. That this effort is now widely represented, so soon after the Holocaust, as a new argument for excluding the Jews from humanity's ranks is a bitter blow. One could easily be driven to despair by it. That is why it is important to keep in mind that, nevertheless, we know what needs to be done.

Sometimes, it's your call

"When did you receive your calling?" I was a rookie rabbi, making small talk with a local minister, when he asked me this question. I was tongue tied. I had never heard voices or had a dream telling me to become a rabbi. God never called on me.

Rabbi Chaim Steinmetz in Montreal

Since then, I have reflected on different types of callings. Some callings appear out of the blue, a burning bush that beckons while searching for lost sheep. Other callings come early on in life. Samson and Samuel receive their callings before they were born. And like them, there are people who, as children, just know that they were meant to be a doctor or a firefighter. Or, like Joshua, they are apprenticed from a young age to follow a mentor into a profession.

However, most of us are never called. There are no angelic apparitions or divine signs that lead to our destiny.

So where can we find our calling?

Sometimes, it's our call. We all experience times when we learn something disconcerting, and think to ourselves. "Someone should do something about that." And we leave it at that, assuming that "someone" will take care of it. Well, there may be no choir of angels, no thunder or lightning, but the moment that you think "someone" should do something is actually a moment of divine calling. It is you, not "someone," who is being called to duty.

This is a much higher form of calling. It is far superior for people to step up on their own, without waiting for God to tap them on the shoulder.

Judith Kaplan, a student at Yeshiva University, found her calling in the aftermath of the World Trade Center tragedy. She joined a group of volunteers who kept a round-the-clock vigil at the city morgue. These volunteers were doing shmirah, standing watch over the bodies until they were buried, reciting Psalms. For months, Kaplan volunteered for this task every Shabbat.

Aaron Singer found his calling after the Passover bombings in Israel in 2002. An American who had served in the Israeli army, he left his wife and baby daughter to return for reserve duty. After noticing that Israeli soldiers were outfitted with average flak jackets, he started a charity to buy state-of-the-art bulletproof vests for Israeli soldiers.

The greatest callings are the ones we discover on our own. The driving force behind these callings are best expressed in the words of a New York City firefighter, interviewed after 9/11.

He said he became a firefighter because, "I wanted to be able to wake up in the morning and look at myself in the mirror, and say I'm doing something with my life."

Now that's a serious calling. What's yours?

The Arab minority: What's Israel's interest?

The arrest of 16 leaders of the radical, northern wing of Israel's Islamic Movement may have been necessary, but it will likely further alienate the Israeli Arab community from the country's mainstream. The arrested men are accused of indirectly contributing to the infrastructure of terrorism through their donations to widows and children of terrorists in the West Bank and Gaza. They claim they only support families in need and do not distinguish between orphans. However, recent legislation limiting contributions from, and transfers to, outlawed organizations makes it possible to indict and probably convict them.

Shiva Hevzog in Toronto

The courts will ultimately decide the issue. Meanwhile, the mass, high-visibility arrests have exacerbated an already-tense atmosphere among Israel's 1. 2 million Arabs, who represent 19 per cent of the population. October 2000, when 13 Israeli Arab citizens were killed by police during a violent demonstration, was the turning point, and since then, the intifadah has fanned the flames of anger and suspicion of them among the Jewish majority.

Israeli Arabs have long complained of discrimination in the allocation of national resources and their de-facto status as second-class citizens. They rightly compare themselves to Israelis rather than to citizens in Arab countries. And while it's true that their point of departure in 1948 was an under-developed, rural society and that they have made huge economic and social advances since then, they have done so with little help from the state that granted them citizenship 55 years ago.

The following statistics speak for themselves: today, one in two Israeli Arab children lives below the poverty line. Twenty-nine per cent of Arab students complete high school, compared to 46 per cent of Jewish students. In 2002, the per capita investment by the ministry of housing in Arab towns was 104 shekels, compared to 11,554 shekels in a Jewish town such as Modi'in. And in 2002, of the overall development budget of 277 million shekels, only 1.6 million was allocated to Arab municipalities.

In the aftermath of "the October disturbances," then-prime minister Ehud Barak announced a 4-billion shekel development plan (of which 50 per cent had been previously committed). The allocation of these funds commenced last year, but according to the Mossawa Center, the Advocacy Center for Arab Palestinian Citizens of Israel, Finance Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's economic austerity plan will return Arab development allocations to 1999 levels – 5 per cent of the government's overall development budget for 2003.

Most Israelis are oblivious to these figures and are more concerned about the "Palestinization" of Israeli Arabs and their identification with the intifadah. They view the few incidents of direct involvement of Israeli Arabs in terror attacks as reflective of widespread support for the intifadah. This is probably true – even though most Israeli Arabs are not at all interested in becoming citizens of a future Palestinian state. The northern wing of the Islamic Movement, whose leaders negate the concept of a Jewish state altogether, is more radical than most Israeli Arabs, who generally support a two-state approach.

Ironically, Israel's security service has warned for some time of the need to fight extremist elements in the Arab community, while investing in equality of civic opportunity to reinforce its relatively moderate, centrist elements. But neither of these things has been done effectively. As a result, in a repeat of a familiar pattern seen elsewhere in the Middle East, the Islamic movement has become a provider of social services, thanks to wealthy donors from abroad, while the shrinking of the Israeli welfare state has reduced already meagre public sector allocations to the same constituency.

Today, several liberal Jewish funders, such as the New Israel Fund and the Abraham Fund, recognize that an investment in Israel's Arab citizens is an investment in Israel's stability. However, no amount of non-governmental activity can make up for gaps in government allocations.

Israelis face a real dilemma, but viewing all Arab citizens as the enemy will only make things worse. Earlier this month, the Israel Democracy Institute published alarming findings on Israelis' commitment to democratic principles. While 81 per cent of Israelis theoretically support equality in law, only 47 per cent support full equality for Israel's Arab minority. Fifty-seven per cent of Israelis believe the government should encourage emigration of Arab citizens.

In the shadow of repeated terror attacks, Israelis' willingness to support equality for Arab citizens is directly linked to their feeling of vulnerability. This link is understandable, but its implications for the country's well-being are serious indeed.

Canada's changing religious landscape

Many Jews look at the recently released 2001 census figures on religion with a concern about Jewish numbers. Here the news is fairly good, and better than for Jews south of the border. The number of Canadian Jews identified by religion rose 3.7 per cent in the 1990s, to nearly 330,000, although Jews' share of the overall Canadian population dropped slightly, from 1.2 to about 1.1 per cent.

This is more than can be said for Protestants and Catholics, who together saw their share of the population decline from 80 per cent to 72 per cent.

Morton Weinfeld in Montreal

In fact, the census figures hold importance for Jews more for what they say about non-Jews and Canadian society in general.

Three demographic changes in Canada's religious landscape involving non-Jews will pose challenges in the future and will likely have far-reaching consequences.

First, Canada is becoming a less Christian society. And Canadian Christians are often only nominally Christian. In 2001, 43 per cent of Canadians reported they had not attended services over the past year, up from 26 per cent in 1986. The number of Canadians contributing to Christian charities and the number of children attending Sunday schools have also declined. Some might argue that newer, more spiritual forms of Christianity are emerging, but to date, the evidence is scant. The declines are essentially in the mainline (liberal) Protestant denominations and among francophone Catholics.

Jews might have mixed reactions to this trend. Conservative Protestant denominations, while still small, are growing. It is among these more devout Christian groups that one finds the strongest support for Israel, as well as government support for religious schools. But many of these groups hold illiberal views that many Jews do not share. And Christians have historically been responsible for much of the oppression of Jews, in the "old country" as well as in North America. But Christian anti-Semitism seems to be a decreasing issue for Canadian Jews. Old wounds are forgotten and new commonalities have emerged.

A second key trend is the dramatic increase in those people claiming "no religion." One in six Canadians now say this. There are many Jews in that group. Indeed the Jewish atheist or apikoros has a legendary role in Jewish folklore and history. But a greater proportion of the additions likely come from among Christians.

The rise in both conservative Christianity and secular atheism signals a potential for greater social and ideological conflict in Canada, a version of the American culture wars. Jews will be caught in the middle.

Religiosity has been found to be associated with a series of conservative social attitudes and behaviours thought to be good for social stability and a healthy civil society: support for strong families and the welfare of children, for strong communities and volunteerism. And many middle class Jews value such stability.

On the other hand, in their historic struggles for full civil and political rights, Jews and atheists often fought side by side against Christian exclusion. Most liberal Jews probably think religion is a good thing, as long as it stays mainly in the private sphere and away from public policy on most issues.

A third trend evident in the new census numbers is the growth of non-Western religions, specifically Islam. This challenges Canadian Jews on two fronts: immigration and foreign policy.

Jews have historically been liberals on immigration. This worked well when many Jews were clamouring to enter Canada and when most other immigrants were Europeans who shared similar traditions and a similar historical frame of reference. But Islamic immigrants, even relatively moderate ones, are unlikely to include many strong supporters of Israel's right to exist, let alone of specific Israeli policies. In the post-Sept. 11 environment, Jewish and Muslim groups have taken opposing points of view on the respective importance of national security concerns versus the civil liberties of prospective immigrants. And more conflict can be expected regarding Canadian policy in the Middle East.

Yet, ironically, in many ways Muslim immigrants to Canada share similarities with Jews, in terms of a strong commitment to cultural retention and survival and the development of large networks of communal institutions. Hopefully, Jewish and Islamic communities in Canada can serve as voices for moderation, non-violence and peace.

The Kirshner File

The United States and the Mideast peace process

The United States has been struggling to bring peace to the Middle East since the Six Day War. For the past three decades, every U.S. president from Lyndon Baines Johnson to George W. Bush has been embroiled in the complex diplomacy of the Arab-Israeli dispute.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Being a superpower, the United States has reason to be interested in the attainment of peace in that notoriously unstable region. Peace would enhance Israel's security, improve Washington's relations with Arab states and secure oil supplies.

Shortly after the 1967 Six Day War, Johnson, who was manifestly pro-Israel, staked out the United States' position on the conflict. It has virtually remained unchanged for the past 36 years:

- Israel should not be required to give up the territories – the West Bank, the Gaza Strip and the Golan Heights – unless the Arabs are ready to recognize the Jewish state and enter into peaceful relations with it.
- East Jerusalem is occupied territory and its status should be settled in peace negotiations. Jerusalem should not be physically redivided again.
- Israeli settlements in the territories are obstacles to peace. Old settlements should not be expanded. New settlements should not be built.
- Palestinian rights should be addressed by granting the Palestinians the right of self-determination. Until quite recently, the United States opposed the creation of a sovereign Palestinian state, preferring an association encompassing the West Bank, Gaza Strip and Jordan. Last year, Washington enunciated its support of a two-state solution.
- Israel's qualitative military edge should be maintained.

The Six Day War, which was caused by Arab brinkmanship, cast the United States into the role of peacemaker, writes William Quandt in Peace Process, a comprehensive and erudite treatment of U.S. diplomacy published by the University of California Press.

Although Johnson patently failed to stop the drift toward war, he was determined not to repeat the mistake Dwight Eisenhower had made after the 1956 Suez war: Israel could not be expected to withdraw from the territories without significant Arab concessions.

Being preoccupied with the Vietnam war, the Johnson administration left the task of post-war peacemaking to a United Nations mediator, the Swedish diplomat Gunnar Jarring. Johnson's successor, Richard Nixon, and his national security advisor, Henry Kissinger, believed that the United States should not weaken friends, such as Israel, and strengthen Soviet clients such as Egypt.

In 1969, following U.S.-Soviet talks, Washington spelled out its views in a document. Final Arab-Israeli borders would be determined only by the parties. An agreement would not be imposed. William Rogers, the U.S. secretary of state, tested the waters by proposing an accord between Israel and Egypt. Israel would withdraw to the international border. In return, Egypt would submit to a formal state of peace.

Egypt was non-committal, but Israel rejected the plan. Nixon's first initiative thereby died on the drawing board. But in 1970, the United States scored a notable success by persuading Israel and Egypt to observe a ceasefire along the Suez Canal, where a War of Attrition had been fought for three years.

In 1971, at the urging of the United States, Jarring presented a memorandum to Israel and Egypt. Israel would withdraw from the Sinai Peninsula, and in exchange, Egypt would make peace with Israel. Anwar Sadat, Egypt's new president, accepted Jarring's proposition. Golda Meir, Israel's prime minister, did not.

Her recalcitrance sparked the Yom Kippur War, which upended several fundamental U.S. assumptions. The first was that Israeli military power would ensure regional stability. The second was that Washington's detente with Moscow would minimize the danger of local conflicts. The third was that the Arabs could not surprise Israel militarily.

With these beliefs shattered, the United States redoubled its efforts to achieve peace in the Middle East and improve its relationship with Egypt without sacrificing its ties with Israel.

"For the first time the United States committed its top diplomatic resources to a sustained search for a settlement of the Arab-Israeli conflict," observes Quandt, a former member of the U.S. National Security Council and now a professor of government and foreign affairs at the University of Virginia.

Kissinger, the freshly minted secretary of state, took charge of the campaign to bring peace and order to the area. His goals were fourfold: to isolate the Soviet Union from the substance of negotiations, to lift the Arab oil embargo, to build support for Arab moderate positions, and to avoid a public quarrel with Israel that could have domestic repercussions.

Kissinger, who also worked for Gerald Ford after Nixon's resignation, was remarkably successful, producing disengagements accords on the Sinai and Golan fronts. But as Quandt notes, he had "a blind spot" toward the Palestinians, trying to bypass this pivotal issue.

Jimmy Carter, Ford's successor, had little patience for the Arab refusal to recognize Israel and strongly believed that Israel would have to come to terms with the Palestinians and the PLO. Carter's policy was underpinned by three elements: the need for peace and normal relations, security arrangements and a solution to the Palestinian problem.

Lyndon Baines Johnson

Carter's vision was clouded by Israel's prime minister, Menachem Begin. He was unwilling to accept the principle of withdrawal from the West Bank and was committed to keeping settlements there intact. In light of the outcome of the 1978 Camp David talks, Begin showed far more flexibility with respect to Egypt's territorial demands.

Quandt suggests that, in the pursuit of a peace treaty, Begin was in a stronger position than Sadat. If talks broke down, Begin would be released from the obligation to vacate Sinai, but Sadat would have nothing to show for his flexibility.

Israel and Egypt finally signed a treaty, Israel's first with an Arab nation. But Sadat fell short of convincing Israel that the Palestinians should be part of the deal. In fact, Begin never renounced his claim to sovereignty of the West Bank.

Ronald Reagan, the next president, shifted U.S. policy away from the Camp David model to a more muscular competition with the Soviet Union for influence in which Israel was regarded as a strategic partner.

To thwart Moscow, Alexander Haig, the U.S. secretary of state, attempted to forge a "strategic consensus" among pro-Western Mideast countries. His idealistic scheme floundered on the shoals of Arab-Israeli tensions.

Meanwhile, Reagan's professed friendship with Israel was sorely tested by three events: Israel's 1981 bombing of Iraq's nuclear reactor, Israel's 1981 decision to annex the Golan, and Israel's 1982 invasion of Lebanon.

On Sept. 1, 1982, after the ouster of the PLO from Beirut, Reagan gave his first and only major speech on the Arab-Israeli conflict. The gist of it was that Washington would oppose Israel's annexation of the territories and an independent Palestinian state.

Israel and the Arabs poured scorn on the formula. And the attempt by secretary of state George Shultz to persuade Lebanon to sign a peace treaty with Israel was sabotaged by Syria, Lebanon's "protector."

The United States opened a dialogue with the PLO in 1988, once its leader Yasser Arafat accepted Israel's right to exist, embraced United Nations Resolution 242 and renounced terrorism. But the dialogue collapsed in 1990, destroyed by an audacious, but abortive, Palestinian terrorist raid against Israel.

George Bush and his bold secretary of state, James Baker, did not mince words. Israel, Baker declared in no uncertain terms, needed "to lay aside, once and for all, the unrealistic vision of a greater Israel."

Iraq's defeat in the 1991 Gulf War created an opportunity for the United States to kick-start peace talks, beginning with the Madrid conference.

Bill Clinton came to the White House at a propitious time. Radical Arab nationalism, as embodied by Saddam Hussein, had been subdued. Yitzchak Shamir, the hardliner Israeli prime minister who scorned territorial compromise, had been replaced by Yitzhak Rabin.

Clinton's presidency was a high-water mark of Mideast diplomacy, coinciding with Israel's peace treaty with Jordan and the Oslo process. Clinton, for all his good intentions, could neither broker an agreement with Syria nor prevent the collapse of the Camp David summit and the outbreak of the second Palestinian uprising.

Judging by its sponsorship of the "road map," which was released recently, these grievous setbacks have not discouraged the United States from trying to bring peace to the Middle East.

Nor have the latest Palestinian suicide bombings. The struggle continues.

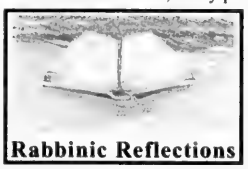
Jewish Life

By RABBI HOWARD MORRISON

Peace unto thee, O Jerusalem



Rabbinic Reflections

While every word of the Torah is sacred and significant, I must admit that I have a favourite Torah portion for personal reasons.

On Shabbat, May 19, 1973, I chanted parshat Behar as I celebrated my becoming a bar mitzvah at the Kotel (Western Wall) in Jerusalem. For years, I would say in jest that I had celebrated a "Behar" mitzvah. How appropriate parshat Behar was for me, given that all of its content revolves around the land of Israel, the place where I read it in public for the first time.

One particular verse has become universally recognized: "U'kratem d'ror ba'aretz l'chol yoshve'ha" – "You shall proclaim liberty to all the inhabitants of the land." Sadly, over the past three years, and more generally over modern Israel's short 55-year history, our Israeli brothers and sisters have not experienced the Torah's call for liberty among the land's citizens.

For a short period back in May of 1973, feelings were very different. My parents, three siblings and I had arrived in Israel one day after Israel marked its twenty-fifth anniversary of statehood. For each of us, it was our very first time in the Jewish state. From my youngest sibling, who was six at the time, to my parents, we all marvelled at each step and each experience during our two-week stay.

This year, parshat Behar was read on May 17. In a non-leap year, Behar would be read together as a double portion with Bechukotai. Traditional commentators discuss the juxtaposition of two seemingly identical phrases toward the beginning of Bechukutai: "Vishavtem la'vetach b'artzechem; v'natati shalom ba'aretz" (You shall dwell safely in your land; and I will give peace in the land.).

"You shall dwell safely in your land," refers to safety among Jews and non-Jews inhabiting the same area. "And I will give peace in the land" refers to internal unity among the different branches and segments of the Jewish people. Interestingly, many midrashim about Jerusalem are linked to this particular phrase.

This Friday, May 30 (28 Iyar), we commemorate Yom Yerushalayim (Jerusalem Day), marking the anniversary of the reunification of Jerusalem during the Six Day War in June 1967.

With the celebrations of Yom Ha'atzmaut and Yom Yerushalayim fresh in our minds, coupled with the remembrances of Yom Hazikaron, the Ontario Jewish community can be proud of its communal solidarity with Israel.

In Toronto, we marched from the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre to Earl Bales Park on Yom Ha'atzmaut, and this past Sunday we walked for Israel in anticipation of Yom Yerushalayim.

Throughout the year, we must continue to invest in Israel, to contribute to Israel, to purchase goods made in Israel and to walk the streets in Israel.

May we soon see the day when there is a genuine lasting peace in Israel among Jews and non-Jews and among the Jewish people itself.

On this Yom Yerushalayim, let us sing the words "May'al pisgat Har Hatzofim, shalom lach Yerushalayim". "From the heights of Mount Scopus, I greet thee; peace unto thee, O' Jerusalem."

South American Jews cope with dismal situation

By WENDY EISEN

Guest Voice

The UIA mission of 21 Toronto leaders and two staff members to Argentina and Uruguay earlier this month was emotional, educational, exhilarating, inspiring and enlightening.

How privileged we were to meet Jewish leaders in another hemisphere, ardent Zionists whose hearts beat as one for the Jewish people; and how sad it was to see Jews whose lives have been dramatically altered by their country's corrupt political system and dismal economic situation.

Argentina's Jewish population numbers 200,000. Today, the former middle class, once successful and proud manufacturers, retailers, entrepreneurs and professionals, has become impoverished. Some men and women who once worked as volunteers in Jewish communal service now require assistance themselves.

On our trip, we experienced one poignant moment after another as we visited Jewish social service centres in both Buenos Aires and Montevideo.

Many new agencies have been created to respond to the crisis. Among them are an employment and job training centre, fully equipped with computers and professional staff, and day-care centres for children at risk, some of whom have been physically abused. The increase in abuse, a new problem among Argentine Jews, is born from the anguish and frustration of their debilitating situation.

The task of maintaining a buoyant and effective Jewish population during these troubling times is accomplished through the dedication of committed Argentine communal leaders, with the assistance of Israeli emissaries from the Jewish Agency for Israel (JAFI) and the Joint Distribution Committee (JDC).

It appears that only through "Jewish education" and "aliyah" – words that were repeated again and again to us – can the Jews of this community survive. Tremendous energy is expended to strengthen Jewish identity through education: 17,000 young people attend Jewish day schools, subsidized by funds sent by JAFI.

It was heartwarming to visit such schools and see children thriving in an environment imbued with Jewish tradition and values, and skilled teachers promoting aliyah.

Among Montevideo's Jewish community of 20,000, we met a group of young people who last year visited Israel on a Birthright trip and are now planning their future lives in Israel.

The following day, we wished a mazel tov to 40 new olim, who, through tears, bade family and friends goodbye at the Buenos Aires airport shortly before boarding their flight to Tel Aviv. Last year, 6,500 Argentine Jews made aliyah.

The contrasts in Jewish Argentina are staggering. On one hand, recently impoverished Jews wait patiently at a social care centre for their monthly food ration stamps; on the other, Jews who have their money securely outside of the country enjoy an affluent lifestyle.

Despite the economic challenges facing both Buenos Aires and Montevideo, the community's leaders are working tirelessly for their annual Keren Hayesod campaigns to raise funds for Israel. But JAFI sends these two communities more money than it receives, as Jewish arms stretch even wider to embrace our brothers and sisters in South America.

As I stood at the Jewish cemetery on Yom Hazikaron along with thousands of Argentine Jews who had gathered in solemn remembrance of Israel's fallen soldiers, I felt overwhelmingly the privilege of being Jewish.

Wherever Jews travel in the world, we are one. This is the miracle of Klal Yisrael.

Shavuot and the Seven Species – part 1

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Shavuot is coming and so are the blintzes and cheesecakes.

Although it's customary to eat dairy foods on Shavuot, you may want to take a pass on some of the cholesterol. There are other ways to remember the holiday at your dining room table – if you look at the holiday's agricultural roots.

In the days of the Temple, Shavuot was the time when farmers would bring the first harvest of seven special grains and fruits to Jerusalem. Nowadays, we have no Temple but you can enjoy dishes made from the Seven Species: wheat and barley, grapes and figs, pomegranates, olives and honey. Today, some Shavuot food for your table – and food for thought – from the World Wide Web.

Wheat has always been considered fundamental to Jewish life. "If there is no flour, there is no Torah; if there is no Torah, there is no flour" (Pirkei Avot 3:21). In Foods of the Bible, Phyllis Glazer presents a wonderful overview of how our ancestors milled grains and explains what kinds of breads, cakes and other dishes were prepared. She then shares recipes for unleavened flatbread, wild wheat salad and earthy unyeasted bread.

I like the way Glazer tries to paint the scene as she does with her Biblical Dumplings: "Perhaps it was the hunting season, and the young shepherd boy was out with his flocks in the hills. His provisions were few – flour, oil, salt and water from a nearby oasis. Chancing upon a quail's nest, he made off with its precious contents. And back at the oasis, he may have come up with this original dish. [Serves the shepherd and three of his comrades]" [http://ariga.com/visions/biblfood/wheat.htm].

Although barley (se'orah) may not have the profile of wheat or the sweet associations of dates, grapes or figs, it does have a strong connection to Shavuot. In addition to being the first grain to ripen in Israel, in the Torah, an offering of an omer (a specific measure) of barley was brought to the Temple on the second day of Passover [http://207.168.91.4/vjholidays/lagbaomer/omer.htm]. From that day onward, it was necessary to count 49 days until Shavuot (Leviticus 23:15) [http://makeashorterlink.com/?Q38D24F94]. After the destruction of the Temple, the practice of bringing barley was discontinued, but Jews continued to count the omer period – and remember the importance barley has played in Jewish life.

Glazer has dug deep into the Torah and has found many facts that will hearten barley aficionados. Barley is mentioned 32 times in the Bible. And in the Book of Ruth, which is read on Shavuot, Boaz first fancied Ruth working in the field under the hot sun and gave her a gift of "six measures of barley" (Ruth 3:15), [http://ariga.com/visions/biblfood/barley.htm].

After you've soaked in barley's rich history, you can try your hand at barley break cakes and wash it down with barley tea. Or reach for something a bit more stout and read about the Land of Israel's ancient ties to beer, usually brewed from barley. Archeologists digging at Tel Isdar have uncovered 3,000-year-old beer mugs that indicate that beer drinking in Israel goes back to the days of King Saul and King David [http://www.fosters.com.au/beer/history/history_of_beer.asp].

As food writer and historian Gil Marks notes, grapes were the most important fruit in ancient Israel. He lists numerous references to grapes and wine in the Torah, from Noah's indiscretions after the flood to the huge grape cluster that the spies brought back after their toured Canaan. The children of Israel are even compared to this: "As grapes in the desert I found Israel." Marks then presents recipes that incorporate wine, such as Israeli Raspberry-Orange Wine Soup, Ashkenazic Chicken with Wine and Alsatian Wine-Poached Pears [http://www.ou.org/shabbat/recipes/grapes.htm].

The Seven Species may be lovely foods but they don't corner the market on great Israeli produce. What unique qualities give them special status? I'll leave the last word to Israeli botanist-agriculturalist, Noga Hareuveni: "They require, in addition to hard work and intelligent agricultural processing, the right degree of sun, wind and rain in the proper proportions at the right time. These seven species obviously demand not only human effort but also Divine intervention. They are testimony to the partnership between humans and God in producing the life-sustaining foods from the earth" [http://www.jpost.com/com/Archive/29.Jul.1999/Columns/Article-0.html].

Next week figs, pomegranates, olives and honey.

Lubavitch asks women to light candles for peace

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

Lubavitch is urging women and girls to light Shabbat candles on May 30 to show solidarity with the people of Israel and add special prayers for the peace and security of Jews everywhere.

The aim is to have women who do not regularly light Shabbat candles light them at least that one night, as "Shabbat candles for peace."

Goldie Plotkin, rebbitzen of Chabad of Markham, told The CJN women will register their intention to light candles on that day at www.shabbatpeace.com. The names will be sent to Israel and publicized there "to show how the Diaspora supports them."

Women who already light candles, she said, are encouraged to focus their prayers on safety and security for all of Israel and to influence their friends and neighbours to also observe this mitzvah.

While in most homes, only the female head of the house lights candles, Rabbi Menachem Mendel Schneerson, the late Lubavitcher rebbe, encouraged girls over the age of three to also light them.

Plotkin said the idea was suggested at the convention of shlichot, female emissaries of Lubavitch, held in February in New York.

"It was in the middle of those awful attacks on Israel, and we wanted to do something on an international scale," she said.

A Lubavitch media release noted that Jewish women have always added personal prayers after lighting candles – prayers for their children, for their husbands, for health, whatever is especially dear to their hearts. "It is believed that these prayers are especially propitious as they are offered at a time when all creation is being sanctified in God's name through the ushering in of Shabbat."

Nechama Dina Jacobson, a rebbitzen at the Jewish Russian Community Centre, said Jewish women have the spiritual power to bring peace into their homes and into the world through their prayers.

Chabad shlichot will be preparing posters and giving out brochures and candles, so that "every Jewish woman should know about this project," she said.

For more information, contact Plotkin, at 905-886-0420, ext. 225, or Jacobson at 416-222-7105.

'Have a knish' was Stroli's motto

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

Rabbi Shmuel Stroli, the owner of Stroli's and the originator of kosher take-out in Toronto, died recently of heart disease. He was 84.

Obituary

His signature was the gift of a knish to every Stroli's customer. Son Alex said this was in line with his retail philosophy. "If you want to shop wisely, shop on a full stomach. So have a knish."

Rabbi Stroli was born in Sharmash, Romania, and received his smichah in Cluj (Clausenberg). In 1950, he and his wife moved to Israel, and then, in 1957, to Toronto.

He started out in the food business working for Hershel Rubenstein, but soon took over his business, along with partner Yitzchak Pilc.

Together they introduced what was then a new concept in Toronto – kosher take-out. "He felt that that was a way to enhance his service, as well as a way to get closer to his customers," said Alex.

Gittel Rosenzweig Weinberger, a family friend and the former rebbitzen in Kitchener, said take-out was a tremendous boon to kosher housewives, especially those who worked outside the home.

Also very appreciated, she said, was that Stroli's shipped kosher meat and other products to small communities.

Another facet of Stroli's personal service was home delivery, complete with non-Jewish, but Yiddish-speaking, drivers.

The venerable Bathurst Street business carried on until 2001, when Rabbi Stroli gave it up to be able to care for his ill wife.

Rabbi Stroli was a life member of Clanton Park synagogue.

While he was not prominently involved in communal life, his son said, he worked consistently behind the scenes. "He was a humble man and felt that any charitable acts should be done quietly."

A devoted family man, Rabbi Stroli was thrilled that just three months before his death he was able to meet his youngest great-grandson.

Rabbi Stroli is survived by his wife Mathilda, son Alex, of Passaic, N.J., daughter Miriam Klein, of Brooklyn, N.Y., five grandchildren and nine great-grandchildren.

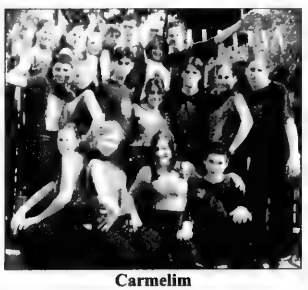
Benefit concert to aid disabled Israeli veterans

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Talented Israeli youth will highlight an upcoming concert sponsored by Aid to Disabled Veterans of Israel-Beit Halochem Canada.

Carmelim, a group of young singers and dancers who have performed in South Africa, Eastern Europe, England and the United States, will headline the benefit, titled A Celebration of Life, June 12, at 7 p.m. at the Toronto Centre for the Arts.



Carmelim

"The Carmelim group expresses the ideologies of a multicultural nation transmitting positive spirit of peace and harmony for Israel's future" said Toby Feldberg, national president of Beit Halochem Canada and concert chair.

Also performing a medley of songs will be renowned tenor Mikhail Kotlyarov, who has entertained opera lovers at the Moscow Column Hall, the Bolshoi Theatre, the Vienna Opera Theatre and the Royal Opera Theatre in London, England.

Beit Halochem is devoted to helping more than 50,000 Israeli disabled veterans and their families. Its four centres in Tel Aviv, Haifa, Jerusalem and Nahariya offer them state-of-the-art sports, social and rehabilitation facilities.

"All proceeds from this concert will go toward ensuring that our Israeli heroes are given the best care possible," Feldberg said.

Toby and husband Saul Feldberg were the honorees at the 2002 Jewish National Fund's Negev dinner in Toronto. They chose Halochem Park in the Haruvit Forest as the beneficiary of the funds raised at the dinner.

Friends of Yiddish leader to be honoured in June

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Bess Shockett, the executive vice-president of Friends of Yiddish, is being honoured for her longtime commitment to the Yiddish language and culture.

Friends of Yiddish and the Committee for Yiddish of UJA Federation are honouring Shockett at a tribute dinner on Sunday evening, June 8, at the Pride of Israel Synagogue for her work with Friends of Yiddish as well as her work in the Jewish and general communities.

Bess Shockett

Born in the Ukraine, Shockett's family came to Montreal when she was four years old. She attended Commercial High School and cheder after school, where she learned Hebrew but the girls were only taught how to daven.

At home, her parent and grandparents spoke Yiddish. She grew up steeped in an awareness of the language that has defined the Jewish people for centuries.

"My grandfather was a Chassid," Shockett told The CJN. "My father got me the Yiddish book, The Family Cranovski by Isaac Batshevis Singer and he told me I had to read it."

But it was more than just reading and speaking the language, she said. "There was a great love and respect for Yiddish in my home. And it was transmitted to me."

> 'There was a great love and respect for Yiddish in my home. And it was transmitted to me'

In 1952, she married Barry Shockett, who was the editor at Southam Press of several trade papers, and they moved to Toronto. The couple first joined the United Jewish People's Order and later, when some members broke away and formed the New Fraternal Jewish Association, joined that association.

In 1972, Shockett was sent by the organization to a conference on Yiddish sponsored by the Committee for Yiddish, the umbrella organization for Yiddish. In 1974, she became director of the Committee for Yiddish, a position she held for 15 years.

In 1982, Shockett and volunteers Shirley Kumove, Les Nirenberg and Gerry Kane formed Friends of Yiddish, a membership organization with monthly meetings.

As its current executive vice-president, Shockett chairs the organization's summer concerts and is a member of the board of Jewish Book Fair, the Holocaust Committee of the Miles Nadal Community Centre, the Jewish Theatre Committee and the Committee of Yiddish at the University of Toronto.

Of all the Yiddish programs she has participated in, Shockett said she loved being a part of U of T's Yiddish committee the most.

"It was a thrill for me having been at the early stages of the establishment of the Yiddish language courses the University of Toronto," she said. "[W]e collected nickels and dimes to pay for the Yiddish program, to attend the recent celebration honouring Al and Malka Green and the other donors, who established an endowment which guarantees Yiddish programs at the U of T in perpetuity."

Shockett said she is excited about the future of Yiddish in Toronto, particularly about plans for the development of a Yiddish cultural and education centre in the city.

"Yiddish has such beauty and it would be ashamed not to give the younger generation the opportunity to learn the music, culture and literature that developed and matured for more than 1,000 years," she said.

"The challenge is to get younger people involved. There is a growing interest in Yiddish music and I hope it will expand to include the language and literature."

For information or reservations for the dinner, call Min Grossman of Friends of Yiddish at 905-709-4602. Reservations must be made by May 31.

The last line of the story "Event to raise funds for new cancer treatment" was inadvertenly omitted. It should have indicated that the Brave Heart Foundation, which raises funds for cancer treatment at Princess Margaret Hospital, is planning a fundraising walk for Sept. 7.

OMISSION

In About Food by Norene Gilletz, April 25, the last step was omitted from the recipe for Czech Apple-Noodle Kugel. It should have read: after the kugel is placed in the prepared pan, place it on the middle rack of the oven and bake at 350 for 35 minutes or until golden.

The CJN regrets the omission.

If it wasn't for a second chance, we would have no chance. Thank you.

The Hebrew University of Jerusalem's Mechina program for pre-academic studies prepares students from disadvantaged backgrounds for university. Every year about 500 students enroll in this intensive one-year program. As a result many young people have the opportunity to achieve what they thought was unattainable.

The Israel government's need to divert funding to defense is exacting a costly toll in budget cuts to the University.

We face increased demands with fewer resources, and can no longer provide students with state-of-the-art equipment and essential tools without your help.

To continue our standard of excellence and well being, we urgently need your financial support now. If you would like to help us give Israel's next generation of leaders the tools they need, and the chance they deserve, please contact me today:

IDF officer Mandel remembered on shloshim

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

A baby on a shag carpet. A little boy in water wings. A teenager clowning for the camera. A young man playing the guitar. A soldier proudly accepting the beret of his unit.

All ordinary pictures of an ordinary life, that became unspeakably poignant when Toronto-born IDF officer Daniel Mandel, 24, was killed in action during an anti-terrorist mission in Shechem.

The pictures were part of a film made in Israel in his memory, which was shown at a program marking the shloshim of his death. The event was sponsored by Mizrachi, the Israeli Consulate and Bnei Akiva Schools Yeshivat Or Chaim and Ulpanat Orot Girls School. It was held at Or Chaim.

Rabbi Hanan Schlesinger, a neighbour and friend of the Mandel family in Alon Shvut, gave a d'var Torah in Daniel's memory. He said that the prophets predicted a time when life would be normal in Jerusalem – "Thus says the Lord of hosts; old men and old women shall yet again dwell in the streets of Jerusalem, and every man with his staff in his hand for very age. And the streets of the city shall be full of boys and girls playing in its streets" (Zechariah, 8:4-5).

This prophecy was more than optimistic, Rabbi Schlesinger said, considering that Zechariah wrote after the return from the Babylonian exile, 70 years after the destruction of the first Temple.

Only 40,000 people returned from Babylon, he said, and the land was barren. "Think," he urged as an aside, "we are now a nation of over five million. We have to recognize what a great miracle that is."

Zechariah knew, he said, that the Jewish experience is one of "cycle after cycle of birth, near death and then rebirth."

People talk about the covenant God made with Abraham, to give him offspring, even though he was already old, and to give him the land of Israel for his descendants. But God made another promise, the rabbi went on.

He quoted from Genesis: "Know surely that thy seed shall be a stranger in a land that is not theirs, and shall serve them… but in the fourth generation they shall come back here."

Although it is thought that the prophecy refers to the time of slavery in Egypt, the rabbis noted that nowhere is that country mentioned.

"We were promised exile, oppression, pain and suffering – that is also part of the covenant," not just that the Jewish people will return to the land of Israel.

And that exile would go on throughout Jewish history to Babylon, to Persia, to Greece and to Rome, he said, up until 1948, when the state was established.

The prophet Ezekiel had a vision of dried bones that were brought back to life by God. After Hitler, the Jews of Europe were dried bones, emaciated skeletons. "Who would have thought that only three years later, those dried bones would arise in an independent state."

Ezekiel's words were not about the resurrection of individuals from their graves, Rabbi Schlesinger said. "Ezekiel was speaking to the collective national identity."

Not only are we back in our land, as an observant Jew who had read the words of Ezekiel would know, he said, but the other prophecy, "Ki mitzion teytze Torah," (from out of Zion shall come out the Torah) has also come true. This refers, he said, to the miraculous outpouring of Torah study and institutions in the country.

The Jewish people are not meant to feel secure in Israel, but must realize that they are dependent on the grace of God for their welfare. "They must realize that they only acquire the brachah [of the land] through suffering and pain."

That suffering and sacrifice is the path to the ultimate redemption, he said. The rabbi quoted Mandel's mother, who said at Daniel's funeral that his death was the price the family paid to be real Israelis.

The cycle continues. During the week of shloshim, Daniel's sister Nichole had a baby. A son.

Israeli children at risk traumatized twice

By HOWARD ENGLISH

Increasing needs, shrinking revenue and longer waiting lists. These are challenging times for Israeli social service agencies and Orr Shalom typifies their multiple difficulties.

Haim Feingold, Executive Director, Orr Shalom

Orr Shalom is a network of group homes across Israel – supported, in part by UJA Federation - catering to children who have been abused or abandoned. Or they've simply lost their way. Some children – as young as 10 - have fallen so far off track that Orr Shalom has rescued them from drug dealing or other criminal activities. And all of them have been traumatized, said Orr Shalom Executive Director, Haim Feingold on a UJA Federation of Greater Toronto speaking tour. Now, added Orr Shalom Chair, Aliza Olmert, during an interview last week, nearly three years of terror attacks have compounded their problems. "These traumatized kids are re-traumatized by the situation," she said.

"The kids need more attention and professional care," added Feingold. "They're afraid to go outside and to the mall."

However, it's not only the children who are deeply affected, it's the professional staff in each home as well. "You have to support a home mother who can't go out. We have to invest much more to prevent burnout among the professionals working in each home," Feingold noted.

Over the past 10 years, Orr Shalom has grown from three homes to 23, with the latest additions taking shape in the Arab community of Abu Ghosh, near Jerusalem and the largely Bedouin city of Rahat. Both facilities are for boys only and Olmert hopes for funds to purchase houses for girls in these communities as well. There are, however, firmer plans for a new girls' home to help pre-teens in Mevasseret Tzion and modern new quarters – also in Mevasseret - purchased with funding from Toronto's Paula Nussbaum – for the 10 residents of an already existing, but rundown group home.

Orr Shalom is definitely not crumbling under the burden of Israel's recession, but the country's economic malaise is making it tougher to function. The waiting list, which now stands at 100, is getting longer. "The more difficult the times, the more families are falling apart," said Olmert. And many of Orr Shalom's Israeli donors are struggling.

Yet, Orr Shalom's dreams are boundless. As Feingold put it, "if there's a need, we're ready to do anything."

Torontonians enjoy rebirth of Mike's Place following bombing

Members of a recent joint UJA Federation-Israel Bonds solidarity mission to Israel paid a special visit to Mike's Place exactly one week after the popular Tel Aviv night club was victimized by a homicide bomber.

The restaurant – a fashionable late-night spot attracting Israelis and tourists - was victimized on April 30 when the killer detonated the bomb at the entrance to Mike's Place. A security guard on duty at the time prevented the bomber from entering. Three people were killed in the attack and 48 injured.

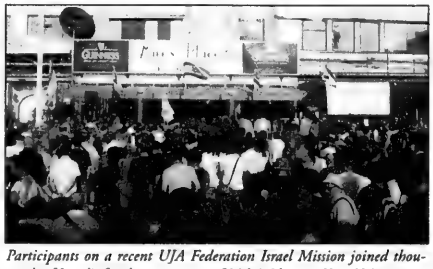
Members of the May 5 to May 11 mission, chaired by Ron Herczeg and Zelic Altman, made it a priority to visit the restaurant following an emotional trip to Tel Aviv's Sourasky Medical Centre. There mission participants met with two teenaged girls, both of whom survived the blast, but were badly burned.

During their visit, a mission member asked the girls whether they would ever go back to Mike's Place. Without hesitation, they both answered, "yes." It was then that several members decided to visit Mike's Place as a symbolic show of support.

"It was an amazing experience," says Altman. "I walked by Mike's Place one day and it had a huge dumpster in front of it and a shutter was drawn over the front. Then, the very next day, there were thousands of people there for its official re-opening. I think Mike's Place reflects the spirit of Israelis. It reflects their defiance and refusal to let terrorism ruin their lives."

"We spent eight days circling the country, from north and south, to east and west, and I've never felt safer and more secure," says Ron Herczeg. "Mike's Place, and how Israelis flocked to it a week after it was hit, is a perfect example of how we, in the Diaspora, should treat Israel. We need to continue going to Israel on missions like this, to show our support, just like the Israelis did when one of their own was attacked."

"On the one hand, going to Mike's Place exactly one week after it was bombed was just a great night out at a packed bar with great people and a great band," says Dr. Elyse Lackie, a mission participant. "On the other hand, you take a step back and realize how amazing this place is to be back on its feet so fast. It makes you realize how incredible Israel is too. The people of Israel, just like Mike's Place, are still there going strong, and they're not going anywhere."



Participants on a recent UJA Federation Israel Mission joined thousands of Israelis for the re-opening of Mike's Place on Yom Ha'atzmaut.

"At Mike's Place we shared drinks and music with both Israelis and foreigners," says Yoram Birenzweig. "There was dancing on the tables, and plenty of smiles. I can honestly say that despite sitting beside the fresh memorial, that evening was filled with defiant happiness, no tears, and no fear. This is the spirit of Jews in Israel. Strong survivors. Fast to recover, and no desire to forget."

The mission took participants to Rabin Square on Yom Hazikaron where they met with the late Prime Minister's daughter. They also visited a trauma center named after Marnie Kimmelman, the Toronto teenager killed on a Tel Aviv beach over 10 years ago. They traveled north to the Golan Heights and hiked through Gamla, where they also attended a briefing by IDF soldiers.

Celebrate Shavuot Buy Israeli

By JUDY HAZAN
Buy Israeli Project

What better way to celebrate Shavuot than with a big, dreamy slice of cheesecake made with cream cheese from Israel? Of course, Jews around the world need little incentive to eat cheesecake at anytime, but at Shavuot it is our tradition to eat dairy products.

According to Rabbi Shraga Simmons, "it is ironic that Shavuot is such a little-known holiday. Because in fact, Shavuot commemorates the single most important event in Jewish history - the giving of the Torah at Mount Sinai."

So what has that got to do with cheesecake, you might ask. There are a variety of arguments that are offered to answer that very question. In the Biblical book Song of Songs, the sweetness of Torah is said to "drip from your lips like honey and milk under your tongue." Another explanation is the juxtaposition in Exodus (23:19) of Shavuot with the prohibition of mixing milk and meat. And yet another explains that the moment the Torah was received, Jews were obligated to the laws of Sh'chita (slaughter of animals) and since they did not have time to prepare kosher meat, they ate diary instead. Whatever the original reason, Shavuot is a special holiday that is marked by the eating of dairy products.

Luckily, in the GTA, stores carrying kosher foods are well stocked with dairy treats from Israel. Shoppers will find many varieties of cheese, creams, milk and frozen foods. Buying Israeli products is a vital way to help the Israeli economy bounce back from many of the losses experienced since the beginning of terrorist violence in September 2000.

Palestinian media continues to encourage martyrdom

By DANIEL HOROWITZ

Itamar Marcus, founder of Palestinian Media Watch.

Palestinian children today are being strongly encouraged to kill Jews in order to die as martyrs (Shahid) in the name of Allah, says one of the world's leading experts on Palestinian media.

"Right now there are roughly 800,000 Palestinian children who want to blow themselves up to kill Jews, and become a martyr," said Itamar Marcus, founder of Palestinian Media Watch (PMW), while on a recent UJA Federation speaking tour in Toronto. "If only five percent actually decide to do it, you're talking about tens of thousands of suicide bombers."

Marcus also cautioned against any hope for change in the way Palestinian media portrays Jews, now that Mahmoud Abbas, the new Palestinian Authority Prime Minister is in office. "Anti-Jewish hatred and the glorification of death are rooted in Palestinian ideology," said Marcus. "The media is an honest reflection of Palestinian ideology."

Founded in 1996, PMW is an independent, non-profit organization that provides government and news outlets with in-depth analysis of the Palestinian media. "We're not so much about studying only the media," Marcus pointed out, "we're studying Palestinian society, their educational system, everything - through the window of media."

"They (Palestinians) have a clear and concrete ideology with many messages, and many ways of transmitting their messages – in particular to young people. This methodology is what is so problematic," observed Marcus. "It is transmitted in age-appropriate ways: for teenagers they use music videos, for preschoolers they use songs, for students they may use religious and political leaders."

Marcus says that when his organization reads the Palestinian daily newspapers, it studies everything, cover to cover.

"We read absolutely everything in their newspapers from the sports section and crossword puzzles to poetry and movie reviews," said Marcus. "About six weeks ago there was an article about a soccer tournament for fifth grade boys. The prize for the winning team was called the Odet Cup. We figured out that Odet was the suicide bomber who killed himself and 29 Israelis on Seder-eve at the Park Hotel in Netanya last year."

In fact, after further investigation, Marcus discovered that each of the 10 teams in the tournament was named after a different Palestinian homicide bomber.

"This is yet another way they glorify martyrs to their children," noted Marcus, "by naming the ultimate prize in a children's tournament after suicide bombers."

PMW recently wrote a report on the use of crossword puzzles in Palestinian newspapers, which also, said Marcus, features images of hate.

"We found a recent crossword puzzle clue which was 'name the Jewish centre for eternalizing the Holocaust and the lies'. The answer was Yad Vashem," said Marcus.

This is a Hamas poster paying tribute to one of the organization's homicide bombers. The axe, which is crashing down on the words "The Jews", says "Hamas"and the caption reads: "We shall knock on heaven's doors with the skulls of Jews."

Palestinian media incitement against Jews and Israel is usually related to events, Marcus said. "If there is a big terrorist attack, the next day will be quieter. It goes back and forth from delegitimization on one level to delegitimization on another level."

For the TV camera, a Palestinian mother sends her son to be killed

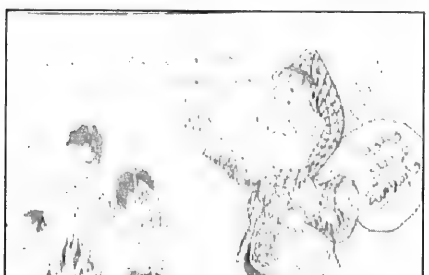
Some of the suicide terror attacks are preceded by a parting ceremony of the terrorist from his mother. One such ceremony on Palestinian TV featured a 17-year-old terrorist, who later killed five Israeli teenagers before he was shot dead.

The following are the TV narrator's description of her hugs and kisses, and a portion of an interview with the mother.

Narrator: "In a silence filled with tears, with a mother's warm longing, his mother embraced him good-bye, planting kisses on his cheeks before the moment of parting. She ordered him not to come back to her except as a Shahid."

The mother (after her son was killed): "I give my son to Jihad for Allah. This is a religious obligation for us. If I were to have compassion for him, or allow him to change his mind it would not be right. I do not want to follow my heart, a mother's feelings. I mean, I sacrificed him for something greater. Even something like this is connected to motherhood. How? Because I love my son and I want to choose the best for him."

(Arab News Network TV)



In this cartoon which has appeared in the Palestinian newspaper Al Hayat, PA Chairman Yasser Arafat is telling the children, "the sea is behind you, the enemy is in front of you. Our only choice is victory."

Arafat: Displaying dead Palestinian children to the world is "the greatest message"

The Shahada mandate to children comes from the Palestinian leadership. Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat presents the actions of children who intentionally died as Shahids as model behavior. Fourteen year-old Faris Ouda died a week after having been filmed on TV hurling stones at an Israeli tank. The story of his death was glorified in the PA official press: "On the day of his death Faris Ouda left his home with a slingshot, after having made himself a wreath decorated with photos of himself and having written on it 'The Brave Shahid Faris Ouda'..." He said to his mother: "Don't worry, mother, Shahada is sweet..."

(PA official daily, Al-Hayat Al-Jadida)

Yasser Arafat has singled out Ouda as a role model for children. Addressing an assembly of summer camp children, he praised Ouda's action, and called the children there "peers of Faris Ouda." Asked in a TV interview what was his message to Palestinian children, he cited Ouda's suicide act, saying dead Palestinian children Shahids are "the greatest message to the world."

Question: "Mr. President, what message would you like to send to the Palestinian people, in general, and, in particular, to the Palestinian children?"

Arafat: "...This child, who is grasping the stone, facing the tank, is it not the greatest message to the world when that hero becomes a Shahid? We are proud of them..."

Fay and Harry celebrate their 75th anniversary

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Past and present: Fay and Harry Nesker's wedding photo and more recently.

Family and friends attended a reception at Cummer Lodge where Fay is a resident to rejoice in their marriage that took place on May 28, 1928. On that day, Fay Lefkovitz and Harry Nesker, who were then living in Chicago, eloped to Waukegan, where they didn't have to wait for a license, lied about their ages and got married.

After, they returned to their homes and did not tell anyone they were married because they knew Fay's family would think they were too young.

In an interview with Harry, 95, and his son Jerry Nesker, a Toronto lawyer, Harry said the secret came out when he came to pick Fay up to take her on a picnic.

Fay's mother said, "You don't take my daughter anywhere until she is your wife."

Harry replied, "But she is my wife. We are married."

To make their parents happy, Harry and Fay exchanged vows for the second time, on July 3, 1928, this time under a chuppah.

Today, Harry said, he lives alone, travels by public transportation and is still independent. His wife has Alzheimer's and has been living at Cummer Lodge for 11 years.

"I love her very much," Harry said. "Sometimes I could just eat her up. When I go to see her, her face lights up and she responds to me. We had problems like everyone else, but my wife was remarkable. She knew how to make people, even strangers, feel happy."

Jerry said, "I absolutely enjoy my Saturdays when I take my father to visit my mother. There is something about watching the two of them together. There is a twinkle in her eyes the minute she sees him."

Harry's grandfather, Michel Nisker (the family names are Nisker and Nesker), came to Toronto in 1905 from Kielce, Poland. He made several trips back and forth while setting up business before he had enough money to bring his family here. Harry's father, Yukel Nisker, came to Canada at the beginning of World War I. They were not able to bring Harry's mother and the rest of the family until 1920.

At the age of 18, Harry left Canada.

"My father was too religious for me," he said. "I couldn't take it."

Leaving with six friends, he went to work as a busboy in the Catskills and later moved to Detroit to live with a friend's aunt.

In those days, he said, you didn't need citizen papers to enter the United States. You only had to pay a head tax.

"I and my friends did not have the money for the head tax so we snuck in across the border by hiding from the inspectors – when they went upstairs, we went down, and when they went down, we went up until we finally got across."

But the authorities eventually found them and they slipped away to another relative in Chicago.

"On the first night we were in Chicago, we went to a dance where I first saw Fay."

He says he was not introduced to her that night, "but I thought she was a very good-looking girl."

That weekend, he attended a party and saw Fay. "She came to the party with a boyfriend, but I took her home that night."

After they had been married a few years, there was trouble. Harry wanted to move back to Toronto to go into the grocery business with his brother. But his mother-in-law, who didn't want them to move, convinced Fay to remain in Chicago with their young daughter Pearl (Weinberg).

Six months later, Harry returned to Chicago to convince his wife to come with him. He told her, "Come with me and if you don't like it in Toronto, you can come back to Chicago."

That never happened. The Neskers stayed in Toronto and had two more children, Brenda (Dolman, who died in 1992) and Jerry.

Harry and his brother owned six grocery stores, which they sold later to Leon Weinstein of Power Supermarkets. Harry also owned a hotel and a chain of men's retail clothing stores.

He said he told Jerry he would retire when Jerry graduated from law school. In June 1972, immediately after Jerry's graduation, Harry retired. He was 64.

In their retirement, the Neskers visited Israel several times and spent their winters in Florida.

When Fay moved to Cummer Lodge, Harry travelled by public transportation to be with her at least four days a week.

Harry and Fay have 10 grandchildren and 15 great-grandchildren.

"They tried to stop us from getting married but they couldn't," Harry said. "And 75 years later, I'm glad that they didn't succeed."

Birthright graduate helps fellow alumni

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

In the four months since Annie Raphael became a post program planner with the Birthright Alumni Committee (BAC) in January, the 26-year-old Toronto native has fielded some of the more than 100 calls and e-mails from past participants on Birthright Israel who want to get involved in the Jewish community here but don't know how.

"I'm excited when I get these e-mails," Raphael (née Hochman) said in an interview at the Lipa Green Building. "I tell them, 'I know exactly where you're coming from.'"

Raphael herself took the free, 10-day trip to Israel in December 2001. A former student of the National Ballet School of Canada who now runs her own dance school called the York School of Dance, Raphael said her first introduction to the organized Jewish community was as a student at the University of Western Ontario, where she studied philosophy after spending a year in Europe on a "dance ambassadorship" program.

"I didn't become immersed in the Jewish community on campus," she said. "I was sort of an outsider looking in, interested but too removed to jump in at that point."

A bit part in a Jewish student play proved to be "exhilarating," and Shabbat dinners at Chabad on Campus were also a positive experience, she said.

After three years on campus, Raphael took a "real person job" at an economic consulting firm before returning to Western to complete her honours degree. After hearing from Jewish students who'd been on Birthright, she decided to take the trip as well.

She said she went on the trip partly because of the Sept. 11 attacks on the World Trade Center, which occured while she was in New York for a dance workshop convention. She said she was "completely changed [and] wanted to do better things" with her life. "I was just glad I was alive. It made me want to do something positive."

The Birthright trip was an "eye-opening experience," she said. Although she had lived in Israel briefly as a six-year-old, this time she "really felt connected to Israel and the Jewish people."

Other participants decided to learn Hebrew or about keeping Shabbat after returning home, she said. Raphael became involved with the Birthright alumni committee. Although the group of about a dozen members received support from UJA Federation/Canada Israel Experience staff, they worked mostly on their own to organize social action and other activities such as a Shabbaton last November, said Raphael.

As they began to plan larger events, it "became evident that a staff person was needed."

Raphael began her new job a month after marrying her husband, Avi, whom she met shortly before her Birthright trip.

Her first project was organizing beginner Hebrew classes at a nominal fee for alumni. Thirty people registered within the first two weeks.

A more spectacular, larger-scale project was the reunion party to celebrate Birthright's three-year anniversary. About 300 people turned up at a downtown nightclub to party and raise money for the Israel Emergency Fund. "We had a blast," she said. "The place was packed."

Upcoming events include a Shabbat dinner in conjunction with the Bernard Betel Centre on May 30 and a Birthright alumni "ultimate frisbee" team beginning June 1. BAC is also helping out the social action group Hands on Toronto on June 22 and with a Shuk in the Park event in early September.

Raphael, who works with alumni of other Israel experience programs as well as Birthright, said her goal is to educate young Jewish adults about the Jewish community, empower them to integrate themselves in to the community and help facilitate the Jewish leaders of tomorrow.

Hamilton rabbi says goodbye after 14 years

By PHYLLIS SHRAGGE
Hamilton Correspondent

HAMILTON — Rabbi Irwin Zeplowitz, spiritual leader of Temple Anshe Sholom for the past 14 years, will take on a new position as senior rabbi of The Community Synagogue in Port Washington, Long Island, in July.

In an interview, Rabbi Zeplowitz said his departure is tinged with a sense of sadness at having to say good-bye to his many friends in Hamilton, but the challenges that lie ahead are akin to "an incredible rush of being able to try something new."

Drawing an analogy between taking on a new position and skiing, he said, "You're on top of the hill and you think, 'What am I getting myself into?' Hopefully you won't fall down and break any bones along the way."

Rabbi Zeplowitz, whose approachability is reflected by his nickname, "Rabbi Z" (pronounced the American way), has welcomed young and old throughout the Hamilton area to address him in that vein.

The Community Synagogue, with 600 families compared to Temple Anshe Sholom's 450, is not vastly different in size, but the demographics are considerably different, he said.

The Community Synagogue, which was established about 50 years ago, is part of a growing community with considerable financial resources. Port Washington attracts many young Jewish families, and the Hebrew school has a population of about 500 students, Rabbi Zeplowitz noted.

His new team will include an associate rabbi, a rabbinic intern, a cantor, a cantorial intern, an administrator, an educator and a school principal.

Although the dynamics in the new position will be different, his responsibilities will remain the same: "to teach, preach, be a pastor, be helpful, speak out and be involved with the community."

Rabbi Zeplowitz has been actively involved with the community in Hamilton through the temple's social justice program, which he has led.

In the period after the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks, Rabbi Zeplowitz and Rev. Canon Patrick Doran of St. Paul's Anglican Church mobilized local clergy to stand in solidarity against racism.

More recently, Rabbi Zeplowitz and Muslim scholar Dr. Yahya Fadlalla formed the Jewish-Muslim Dialogue Group, made up of about a dozen high school and university students in the Hamilton area who meet twice a week to share their beliefs.

Rabbi Zeplowitz said it is vital for Jews to build relationships between themselves and others, whether they are Muslims, Palestinians, Buddhists or Christians.

He has guided the temple's many social justice programs, including the adoption of families from the former Yugoslavia, integration of refugees from the former Soviet Union and helping women and children from abused homes. Initiatives such as these are part of the Reform movement's commitment to social activism, he said.

He strives for a solid link between the temple and the Reform movement as a whole.

"What I've tried to do is connect the congregation with what is happening in the larger Reform movement. I really believe that whatever power we have as individuals, we have a much greater power as a sacred community, so I've made a big effort throughout my 14 years here to be connected with the Reform Rabbis of Greater Toronto."

He sees the Reform movement as moving in two directions at the same time.

"In some ways we are much more traditional, in terms of ritual, in terms of using Hebrew, and in terms of the connection to the state of Israel... Some tendencies are more liberal... the inclusion of if homosexuals and lesbians in Jewish life."

Rabbi Zeplowitz said one of his goals as a rabbi is to form a community that allows individuals to express themselves, and in turn, be treated with respect. The synagogue should be open to all ages and provide a comfortable environment for "kids who can run around and hug the rabbi, older people who feel they are not forgotten, not cast away."

The synagogue should provide a sense of belonging for the disabled, he said. "It should not be a burden for them to come, but a joy."

The synagogue should be a place where all can go "to share grief and share their laughter."

Rabbi Zeplowitz said from his standpoint as spiritual leader, "a congregation must be committed to social justice, to look beyond its own walls. The ideals of our people are not just about having meaning in our own lives. And a congregation must be committed to Jewish learning. Learning is ongoing, from cradle to grave."

His words of advice to the rabbi who will eventually fill his shoes at Temple Anshe Sholom are to "be clear in your vision, don't try to be like the person whom you've succeeded, and be patient.

"The relationship of a rabbi to a congregation is a very unique relationship. You're both leader and follower [leading to] unresolved tension on lots of levels, sometimes in terms of authority, sometimes in terms of psychology... It takes time to develop a sense of trust."

Rabbi Zeplowitz was born in Niagara Falls, N.Y. He studied at the University of Toronto and the Jewish Institute of Religion at Hebrew Union College, and was ordained as a rabbi in 1984. He spent five years as a rabbi in the Chicago area before becoming spiritual leader of Temple Anshe Sholom.

Rabbi Zeplowitz is past president of the Canadian region of the Central Conference of American Rabbis. He sits on the National Social Action Committee of the Canadian Council for Reform Judaism and he is past chair of the Reform Rabbis of Greater Toronto.

He and his wife Anne have three children, Abigail, Deena and Nathan.

BB wants dot.com to drop Al-Jazeera

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL – Representatives of JumpTV have agreed to meet with B'nai Brith Canada officials who have accused the Montreal-based Internet company of "broadcasting hate material."

The charge was levelled after JumpTV began offering Al-Jazeera, the Qatar-based Arabic-language news channel, to subscribers through its Web site earlier this month.

JumpTV spokesperson Blake Markle told The CJN that he would not comment on the hate allegation until the meeting, which has not been scheduled. "We're holding out [on commenting] till we sit down with these people."

JumpTV, which Markle said has been in business for a couple of years, describes itself on its Web site as providing live online delivery of TV networks from broadcasters around the world. These networks are available to subscribers worldwide with an Internet browser and Media Player.

Markle would not say how many subscribers the company has or how much demand there has been for Al-Jazeera, which JumpTV is offering for $9.95 (US) a month.

The company says its online streaming operations are conducted from facilities in Canada and the United States.

Earlier this month, B'nai Brith issued a press release warning JumpTV's chief executive officer Farrel Miller that it will hold the company responsible for transmitting hate material, even if it originates elsewhere.

"B'nai Brith Canada has had years of experience in dealing with hate on the Internet, working together with government and community agencies, Internet service providers and legal/legislative experts," said national president Rochelle Wilner.

"There are ways of ensuring coverage that meets the needs of ethnic communities without contravening Canadian anti-hate laws."

Executive vice-president Frank Dimant added: "All carriers, whether Internet, cable or satellite, have an obligation to ensure that they are not used to disseminate hate material. If they do not take this responsibility seriously, B'nai Brith Canada will explore all available legal remedies to counter the dissemination of hate propaganda in this country."

B'nai Brith's communications director Joseph Ben-Ami told The CJN that "we are prepared to use any whatever legal recourse we have" to stop JumpTV from airing Al-Jazeera. But as there is no regulation of what goes over the Internet, pursuing those who broadcast hate is difficult, he conceded.

He said B'nai Brith might consider going to a human rights commission with a complaint because precedents exist for that route.

Both B'nai Brith and Canadian Jewish Congress have protested an application by the Canadian Cable Television Association (CCTA) to the Canadian Radio-Television and Telecommunications Commission in March to add Al-Jazeera to the list of channels CCTA members can offer on their digital tiers.

Ben-Ami said B'nai Brith is "not against Al-Jazeera per se," but he said the station has "certainly transmitted anti-Semitic material from time to time."

Montreal Vaad gives OK to doughnuts

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

The Vaad Ha'ir of Montreal has good news for doughnut lovers.

Rabbi Saul Emanuel, its executive director, has sent a letter to synagogues confirming that the doughnuts sold at the new Krispy Kreme outlet in Marché Central are under the supervision of KSA (Kosher Supervision of America) and are kosher, although not Cholov Yisrael.

Rabbi Emanuel told The CJN the Vaad Ha'ir has been assured by KSA that the batter and other ingredients used in the doughnuts made here come exclusively from Krispy Kreme's two mixing plants, which are KSA-certified. The original is in Winston-Salem, N.C., and the newer one, opened last year, is in Effingham, Ill.

"We have checked out the situation through numerous inquiries with KSA," Rabbi Emanuel said.

He added that other kashrut agencies in New York have also certified Krispy Kreme.

Rabbi Emanuel explained that while the ingredients that go into the doughnuts are kosher, the store itself is not under the supervision of the Vaad nor is the Vaad certifying the product. The store is open on Shabbat, which automatically rules out the possibility of its receiving the MK hechsher, he said.

Nevertheless, Rabbi Emanuel said it is perfectly acceptable for those who keep kosher to consume the doughnuts, except for those who use only Cholov Yisrael dairy products. Products are deemed Cholov Yisrael when a mashgiach has been present right from the time the cows are milked.

Rabbi Emanuel said that because Krispy Kreme has promised KSA that no other food ingredients ever come into its stores, there is no concern about the kashrut of anything the products come in contact with when they are made.

Krispy Kreme has more than 270 stores in the United States. Canada's first opened two years ago in Mississauga, Ont.

According to Krispy Kreme's Web site, the only animal products used are eggs and dairy derivatives. All food additives are vegetable-based and the doughnuts are fried in vegetable shortening. A few of its stores in the United States are certified kosher.

KSA, which is based in Los Angeles, is run by rabbis Binyomin Lisbon and A. Tzemach Rosenfeld. The not-for-profit agency is a member of the Association of Kashrus Organizations. On its Web site, KSA describes itself as "the largest recognized and accepted Orthodox kosher certification agency based in the western United States."

Context needed when describing extremist groups

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

Reporting on the recent spate of terrorist attacks that left nine Israelis dead and scores injured, James Bennett of the New York Times wrote that "[a]t least two of the attacks appeared to be the work of militants from Hamas, which opposes any negotiations with Israel" (May 19).

Writing in the Globe and Mail the same day, Paul Adams quoted Hamas spokesperson Mahmoud Zhar: "These [attacks] reflect the people's view that we should not waste our time hoping America or Israel will give us our land." Like Bennett, Adams notes that Hamas "has already rejected the peace talks."

Like many other correspondents, neither Bennett nor Adams mentions that these terrorists – and other extremist Islamic groups such as Islamic Jihad – reject not only the U.S.-sponsored "road map" to peace or other negotiations with Israel, they reject Israel's very right to exist as a Jewish state. They seek Israel's annihilation.

This is not merely a rhetorical device to solidify their political opposition to secular nationalist Palestinians. Rather, it is a dedicated, religiously based, uncompromising aim. Journalists need only read the Hamas charter for the chilling details. It calls for the creation of an Islamic republic to replace Israel, saying that Muslims should "raise the banner of Allah over every inch of Palestine."

Journalists must understand this credo, in order to accurately describe what Hamas, Islamic Jihad and other violent extremists hope to achieve as they continue to randomly target Israeli men, women and children for murder.

When Zahar, quoted by Adams, talks about "our land," he is referring not merely to the West Bank and Gaza, as most Westerners naively assume. He is referring to all of Israel.

From time to time, this column has pointed out the need to provide context in descriptions of groups such as Hamas. This point bears repeating, so central is it to understanding Israeli-Palestinian relations.

Some Israeli analysts are now explaining – with an increasing sense of urgency – that if Hamas and Islamic Jihad are allowed to challenge secular moderates, if they grow in power and influence, the conflict between Israel and the Palestinians will be transformed from a nationalist to a religious one. If this happens, Islamists will allow absolutely no accommodation with "non-believers" be they Jewish or Christian. The fact that Christian Arab residents of the territories have already been largely squeezed out by the growth of Islamists, especially in Bethlehem and the surrounding towns of Beit Jala and Beit Sahur, is one of the Middle East's great untold stories (as the editor of this paper observed many months ago).

The same Israeli analysts who warn about the unchecked power of Hamas and Islamic Jihad also make it clear that pro-Western Arab states, including Egypt, Jordan and Morocco, must publicly support secular Palestinian moderates, now led by Palestinian Authority Prime Minister Mahmoud Abbas. Otherwise, Abbas will not have the strength – already eroded by PA president Yasser Arafat's machinations – to do what is required to clamp down on Hamas, Islamic Jihad and Fatah's own Al-Aqsa Martyrs Brigade.

Unless these groups are disarmed and neutralized, all hope for progress in an peace talks will remain a sad illusion.

Layton appeals to 'progressive' Jewish voters

The resolution calls on three fellow members of the Socialist International – Israel's Labor and Meretz parties and the Fatah faction of the Palestinian leadership – to "agree that the mutual recognition of the state of Israel and the state of Palestine, as two states to live side by side, should be the initial commitment before negotiations start between the two peoples."

The main elements of a final settlement, states the measure, involves implementing the post-1967 UN Resolution 242; establishment of a Palestinian state "side by side with Israel under irreversible security guarantees for both sides; borders ensuring that the West Bank and the Gaza Strip are part of the Palestinian state, but opening the possibility of negotiated land swaps; both states [with] their capital in Jerusalem, and a just solution to the refugee issue."

Layton knows he has his work cut out for him in shoring up support among Jewish voters. Examples of deteriorating relations have abounded: Amid the heated rhetoric arising from the current Mideast violence, NDP-MP Svend Robinson, an unabashed pro-Palestinian voice, returned from a well-publicized visit to the region a year ago and pronounced that the Israeli government and military were "guilty of torture and murder."

Then leader Alexa McDonough demoted Robinson by removing the Middle East from his portfolio as foreign affairs critic. But McDonough, who took over the file herself, then went on her own fact-finding mission, and called on Israelis "to assume some responsibility for the Palestinian people whose land they now occupy."

For decades, the NDP enjoyed a traditional base of Jewish support, made up of elements in the community committed to social action. Has the party now lost that support?

"I'm a political scientist, so I'm going to take that as an empirical question," responded Layton, a one-time university professor. "I just don't know whether there's been an empirical study that would show that. I don't know that any political scientist has analyzed where the vote of Jewish Canadians has gone. I have certainly sensed a cooling, but I think I'm feeling a warming beginning to happen."

The explosive Mideast conflict also emerged as a powerful wedge in the NDP leadership race to replace McDonough. Two candidates, Nystrom and Joe Comartin, won praise from Muslims for going beyond party policy when they said the Palestinians have a complete "right of return" to parts of Israel their families inhabited before 1948.

Layton had a terse response.

"Those candidates were not successful. The candidate that was successful did not take that position and I don't believe a great many reasonable people would adhere to that kind of rigidity. I don't know whether those statements have left a lasting negative impact. [But] it will be noted that those who said that did not succeed."

As for Robinson, he's now the party's health critic, but is also the NDP's spokesman on international human rights as well as part of an "advocacy team" on peace and international affairs headed by McDonough.

Layton conceded the NDP is an opposition party in a country that isn't a central player in the Middle East. "But if we can play some small role in helping to create bridges and dialogue that work toward a just and peaceful solution that ensures Israel as a Jewish state that has integrity and doesn't have to worry about its longterm viability – not to mention being safe and able to live in peace – and build on progressive initiatives being taken in Israel, at the same time as a Palestinian state can come into being – if we can make a small contribution to all that, then that's what we're going to try to do."

Turning to domestic issues, Layton warned that a Liberal government headed by Paul Martin will mean "more aggressive financial conservatism."

"Unless there's been a complete transformation, under Paul Martin, we'll see an expression of interesting ideas which are either not implemented, or the reverse of those ideas are," Layton said.

For example, he charged, when Martin campaigned for the Liberal leadership in the early 1990s, "he argued we should have a national housing policy. The details of that paper could have been written by me. It was terrific. The moment he became finance minister, he took steps not only to avoid implementing the policy, he annihilated the entire housing program and got the federal government completely out of it."

The NDP's top priority, he said, is health care.

He said there is a $6-billion gap between federal spending and the recommendations made last November by the Romanow Commission on the future of health care.

Investments in transportation, especially in new light-rail and rapid-transit initiatives, should come from the gas tax, he said.

Layton called for "serious investment" in water treatment. "We have far too many communities in Canada that are told they have to boil their water every summer."

The NDP also seeks an economic strategy based on sustainability. That means working with automakers on so-called green cars – those powered by alternative fuels – and technologies driven by wind, solar energy and hydrogen.

The NDP also favours proportional representation, and Layton points to Wales and Scotland as successful models.

The move would increase the number of women and minorities in government. It would not, as widely feared, lead to shaky minority governments, but show that "people working together in coalitions is a good thing. We're way behind the times."

Helping kids make healthy choices

By JENNIFER M. PAQUETTE
Special to The CJN

The bad news is that our children are under pressure; the good news is we can make a difference, according to a panel at a May 15 symposium called Healthy Choices: Helping Teens Through Adolescence.

Sponsored by Canadian Friends of Hebrew University, the evening offered parents, educators and camp staff an arsenal of common sense information, mostly around issues of obesity and eating disorders, now the second-most common chronic children's illness, according to moderator Dr. Leora Pinhas.

In the past, women measured their beauty by their own village's standards Pinhas said. In a digital and global village, they compare themselves not only to women worldwide, but to computer-generated and digitally retouched faces and bodies.

We can't compete with these impossible standards, she said, so we must arm teens with a balanced perspective on fitness.

"Better fat and fit than thin and out of shape," said Dr. Naama Constantini, a sports medicine physician with the Israeli Olympic team. The biggest risk, she said, is not high cholesterol, high blood pressure or diabetes.

"It's low fitness – that's killer number one."

There's a 50 per cent decline in physical activity in girls between ages six and 16, Constantini said, far more than for boys. Girls who do stay active do so more for weight loss than health benefits, a mindset that can lead to an unhealthy workout regime.

Too much exercise can lead to menstrual problems and inhibited accumulation of bone density, which could cause osteoporosis later in life. Most of a woman's lifetime bone mass is accumulated between ages 11 and 15, Constantni said.

"It's like a bank; the more you put in now, the more you will have in the future." Exercising properly during adolescence helps to accumulate almost twice as much bone mass she added.

Constantini quoted Maimonides' philosophy of "not too much, not too little." We shouldn't just encourage adolescents to exercise; our emphasis must shift towards healthy, moderate exercise.

This philosophy also applies to food, Dr. Nava Israel, head dietitian for the 1997 and 2001 Maccabiah Games, said. Improperly educated parents and "scientific" eating can undermine teens' wellbeing, she added.

"Everybody's an expert ... The most natural thing, feeding our children ... has become a crazy thing."

Eating problems are rooted in misplaced dietary morality, said Israel. We call foods full of sugar and fat "bad," but their appeal is based on survival instincts.

"Those are the foods our mouth prefers because they nourish us very well in small amounts," she said. "This is the way we're built."

Deeming certain foods "forbidden" means we "go overboard on both ends – absolutely none, or too much," Israel said. Kids learn this behaviour early, so parents must preserve their innate balance.

"Children will stop in the middle of ice cream if they've had enough – if they're not deprived in the first place."

Israel suggested offering an appealing array of food and insisting children show up for meals. When it comes to mealtimes, she said, the household is "not a democracy."

Make mealtimes pleasant, and give up the guilt; parents aren't responsible for putting food in kids' mouths, she said.

"They eat what they need if they're not bugged, if we don't make them conscious of it. We deliver food and atmosphere, but we're not responsible for how [their] body turns out."

As a therapist treating eating disorders, Cindy Goodman Stulberg also emphasized the importance of setting a good example within the family.

"You can't talk about adolescents without talking about parents and families," she said. Teenagers don't seem to care what we think, but they're watching.

"They're very sensitive to parents' attitudes about food and weight-related issues."

Kids also watch their parents' relationships.

"Even if [parents are] not openly arguing, kids pick up on tensions," she said. If a child develops problems, parents then focus on the behaviour rather than its causes.

"If the parents' stuff isn't addressed," she asked, "how can the kids get better?"

Goodman Stulberg also recommended moderation. Parents' expectations are often too high, she said.

"Teenagers are irresponsible, moody," she said. "You can't do everything ... Sometimes, you can't do anything. Know that feeling helpless happens."

But while we may occasionally be powerless, we can empower teens by freeing them from media stereotypes, said Dr. Gail McVey, chair of the Ontario Community Outreach Program for Eating Disorders. Through peer groups and a fun health curriculum, McVey said she is raising self-esteem in adolescents and lowering instances of eating disorders like bulimia.

Though most speakers focused on girls, McVey showed photographs of two Luke Skywalker action figures – one from the 1970s and one made more recently. The newer one was more muscular with a triangular body and meaner-looking face. This, she said is typical of what boys see in cartoons and video games.

McVey said she hopes her studies will help put an end to harmful teaching methods.

The common curriculum suggests students learn about eating disorders in Grade 7 – "a very impressionable age." They tend to disregard warnings but pick up on harmful behaviour.

In response to her work, McVey said some schools are starting younger and shifting focus from weight to wellness and from "normal" shapes to healthy attitudes.

"It's not so much about what children eat," she said. "It's about what they're not doing."

Constantini cited a two per cent increase in obesity for every extra hour of television a day. However, she said, as little as five minutes of activity at a time can counteract this.

They're looking to parents, she said, and their impact can be enormous.

"Do small things but accumulate them. Integrate exercise into life ... our role is to ... keep it fun."

Despite doubts, Sharon will push road map forward

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Prime Minister Ariel Sharon said in remarks broadcast Monday that he would make every effort to push the road map forward, despite his doubts about the peace plan accepted by the cabinet Sunday.

The Prime Minister's Office said early Monday morning that Sharon would meet with his Palestinian counterpart Mahmoud Abbas in the next few days, Israel Radio reported.

The expected talks will follow the cabinet's conditional approval Sunday of the road map to Middle East peace brokered by the United States, the European Union, Russia and the United Nations. It calls for an independent Palestinian state by 2005. The Palestinians accepted the plan in its entirety several weeks ago. The road map decision was the first time an Israeli government has gone on record as supporting the concept of a Palestinian state.

"This is not a happy decision," Sharon said late Sunday, speaking in Jerusalem. "We will need to make painful concessions, and if the process moves forward, and I will make every effort to see that it does, we will make painful concessions such as these. But in one sphere there will be no concession, and that is in the sphere of the security of Israel and of its citizens.

"I know that there are doubts," Sharon continued. "Everyone has doubts. I have doubts as well. But I know one thing. We must try."

Early reports suggested that the meeting between Sharon and Abbas could be convened at the beginning of this week, but unnamed officials said the talks, following an initial session on May 18, would likely take longer to arrange.

'We will need to make painful concessions'
– Sharon

The Sharon-Abbas meeting, held at Sharon's office in Jerusalem, was the first top-level Israeli-Palestinian meeting since the outbreak of the intifadah in September 2000. Following their three-hour meeting, both sides said that no agreements had been reached.

Defence Minister Shaul Mofaz of Sharon's Likud party, who voted for the road map in last Sunday's session, has consistently warned that it poses dangers for Israel.

In granting qualified approval to the road map peace plan, the cabinet had not ratified a binding legal document, but rather a "declaration of diplomatic intentions," Mofaz said in remarks broadcast Monday on Army Radio.

"We did not vote on an international agreement. In fact, this is not a legal document. There is no sort of commitment here; rather this is a declaration of diplomatic intentions," he said.

"In my view, this is a reality in which we are saying yes to the process, even though the chances are not necessarily high – certainly not [in view of the] period of time that has transpired since the [Abbas] government was established – but we are prepared to go into the process positively."

Mofaz said he trusts that Washington will address Israel's security and other concerns outlined in the list of 14 reservations the government has sent to the administration of U.S. President George W. Bush.

"The Americans stated that they are relating to all of Israel's comments 'fully and seriously,' and from this it can be understood that there is very profound commitment with respect to Israel's comments," Mofaz said.

Meanwhile, unnamed officials were quoted as saying a planned tripartite summit with Bush, Sharon and Abbas could be held in Aqaba, Jordan, rather than the previously announced site, the Red Sea resort of Sharm al Sheikh in Egypt. Preparations have begun in Washington to send Bush to Egypt and Jordan in early June to advance the process.

Bush said Friday he was considering meeting with Sharon and Abbas if it would help with peace efforts.

Support personnel left Washington on Sunday morning to pave the way for the likely trip to Egypt and Jordan. It was reported that Bush might also visit a third country in the region after the Group of Eight nations summit in Evian, France, concludes on June 3, according to three administration officials.

Sharon is opposed to convening a U.S.-led summit in Sharm al Sheikh, if it includes representatives from Europe and the United Nations, sources in Jerusalem indicated Saturday night.

The prime minister may, however, agree to participate in a smaller forum including only representatives from the United States, Israel, the Palestinian Authority, Jordan and Egypt, the sources said.

France gets frosty rebuffs from Shalom

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — French Foreign Minister Dominique de Villepin told his counterpart Silvan Shalom at a meeting in Jerusalem Sunday that France is interested in improving its relations with Israel and in helping to implement the road map.

Shalom rejected the offer, saying Israel will accept only American implementation of the plan.

Shalom also criticized de Villepin's decision to meet Palestinian Authority (PA) President Yasser Arafat Monday, which led to Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's decision not to meet the French minister.

Villepin said France is trying to pressure Arafat to abide by his commitments. He said while it supports PA Prime Minister Mahmoud Abbas, "boycotting Arafat will only cause additional problems."

Their opinions clashed again when Shalom reiterated Israel's objection to a Palestinian "right of return," saying no such "right" existed in international law.

"Even the Labor government objected to this," he said.

De Villepin replied that former prime minister Ehud Barak had agreed to accept 40,000 Palestinian refugees into Israel during the Taba talks, and asked whether Israel would agree to a similar arrangement in the future. Shalom did not respond directly, saying only the issue is problematic.

But despite these disagreements, progress was made in bilateral relations and the ministers signed a formal agreement to establish "a high-level committee to improve relations." The committee will examine joint projects in diplomacy, science, commerce, culture and education.

De Villepin told Shalom that in recent weeks, France has stepped up pressure on Syria to withdraw its forces from Lebanon and restrain Hezbollah. He suggested that in exchange, Israel should stop violating Lebanese airspace, which he said would make it easier to pressure Lebanon into restraining Hezbollah and accepting UN Security Council Resolution 425.

"Foreign Minister de Villepin came on a conciliation visit," said Danny Shek, head of the Foreign Ministry European desk. "The minister said he attaches great importance to improving bilateral relations. My impression is that the French very much want to change their image in Israel."

De Villepin sent a similar message in meetings with Israeli President Moshe Katsav and Labor MK Shimon Peres, stressing that France wants a rapprochement and to help with Israeli-Palestinian peace. He also gave Katsav a letter from French President Jacques Chirac, in which he wrote: "Israel knows it can count on France and the European Union."

Monday, as The CJN went to press, de Villepin was scheduled to meet Arafat and Abbas, scheduling half as much time for the former as for the latter.

UN body called a 'human rights charade'

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Irwin Cotler has been a keen observer of international human rights issues for decades and has often warned of the disturbing rise of Jew-hatred expressed through vilification of Israel. But even he was taken aback by the institutional anti-Israelism and lack of desire to tackle global human rights issues at the recent meetings of the 59th UN Commission on Human Rights (UNCHR) in Geneva.

"You have to be there to witness what is effectively an Alice in Wonderland human rights charade," said the Mount Royal Liberal MP, law professor and past legal counsel for Nelson Mandela and Andrei Sakharov.

Irwin Cotler

Beyond the fact that Libya chairs the commission, the UN body's lack of commitment to human rights can be seen through its discriminatory treatment of Israel, the denial of international due process, the implicit acceptance of terrorism as a legitimate means of opposing Israel and its turning a blind eye to human rights violations around the world, Cotler said.

In addition, when Israel is in the dock, "the conviction and sentence is pronounced before the hearing begins," he said.

Cotler, who spent about one week at the six week-long human rights forum, said, "Israel was the only country that was the object of a country-specific indictment before the commission hearings began."

The world's most egregious human rights violators – China, Syria, Saudi Arabia, Russia and Zimbabwe – "enjoy exculpatory immunity. This is a double standard at its zenith," Cotler said.

Cotler's critiques were echoed in part by Human Rights Watch (HRW), which stated in a news release that "an 'abusers club' of governments hostile to human rights has further consolidated its position and blocked several important country initiatives, while the United States and to a lesser extent, the European Union have not exerted positive leadership."

Cotler said the Jewish state is subjected to "a form of apartheid" in which it is disenfranchised, not able to vote on members of the commission, not eligible to be nominated to it and not entitled to participate in the drafting of resolutions that are aimed at it.

"It's the classic demonstration of denial of international due process," he said.

Illustrating the world body's discriminatory treatment of Israel was the decision to maintain an open-ended mandate for a special rapporteur for the West Bank and Gaza Strip while terminating the mandate of a rapporteur for Sudan, where "genocide by attrition" is occurring, he said.

Even when the UN body addresses issues of international concern, such issues as the rights of women, the rights of children or homelessness, the issue is hijacked and ends up turning into an indictment for alleged Israeli violations, he said.

A particularly disturbing development at the forum, he said, was the UN body's sanctioning of "the use of all available means" – codewords used to justify terrorism – in the Palestinian struggle against Israel.

Cotler said Canada, which takes its international commitments seriously, ought to forcefully oppose this misuse of an international body.

"By its participation, Canada gives this charade a certain implied legitimacy. I recommend that Canada speak out about a process that singles out one state for differential treatment. Canada should no longer involves ourselves in a process that engages in this kind of delegitimization of a member state and brings international law into disrepute."

Cotler said he is adding his name to a petition sponsored by the World Jewish Congress, of which he is a legal counsel, that is being circulated to Jewish institutions and to NGOs in the broader community. The petition calls on UN Secretary General Kofi Annan to take the necessary initiatives to end "this human rights charade, including anti-Semitic conduct being undertaken under the protective cover of the UN."

Cotler said he is also asking his parliamentary colleagues to support urgent UN reform.

Canada can also push to include Israel as a full fledged member of one of the UN's regional blocs (opposition from Arab states has excluded Israel from the Asian bloc).

The situation as it now stands "is not just prejudicial to Israel but it undermines the UN and international law," he said.

Jewish Agency prepares for immigration from Morocco

By YAIR SHELEG
Ha'aretz Daily News Ltd.

JERUSALEM — The Jewish Agency office here is taking steps to prepare for a mass emigration of Moroccan Jews, following a string of terror attacks two weeks ago in the country and concern that Al Qaeda is planning to attack more Jewish targets there.

The agency is focusing on raising enough money to pay for the immigrants' benefits. Each immigrant is entitled to a rent subsidy of approximately $300 (US) per month for the first five years, a special "absorption grant," as well as a basket of benefits.

The decision to get ready for a wave of Moroccan immigrants was made even before last week's terror atrocities, at the last meeting of the agency's board of governors in February. The agency plans to raise the money by canvassing donors overseas, but because of the economic crisis, it was decided not to ask the government for help.

The chair of the Jewish Agency's immigration department, Aryeh Azoulai, told Ha'aretz last week that the number of immigrants will not exceed a few hundred. He added that several dozen Moroccan Jews arrive here annually and said there are no plans to send emissaries to Morocco to encourage the Jewish population to leave.

The Week in Israel

May 19

• Three people were killed and 18 wounded when a suicide bomber struck a shopping mall in Afula.

• A body that washed up off the Tel Aviv shore earlier this month was identified as the would-be British bomber, Omar Khan Sharif, in the April 30 suicide attack on a Tel Aviv pub. Sharif fled the scene of the attack at Mike's Place after his explosives belt failed to detonate.

May 20

• Hundreds of Palestinians in Beit Hanoun demonstrated against Hamas for firing rockets on Israel. The protest occurred shortly after the Israel Defence Forces pulled out of the Gaza town. Israeli troops entered Beit Hanoun last week in response to Hamas' launching of Kassam rockets on the Negev town of Sderot.

May 21

• The Knesset gave preliminary approval to a bill that would reduce the number of chief rabbis from two to one. Currently, Israel has both an Ashkenazi and a Sephardi chief rabbi. "The separation of Ashkenazi and Sephardi Jews is no longer relevant," the bill reads.

May 22

• Mevakshei Derech, a synagogue of the Reform movement in Jerusalem, had some of its windows smashed in an act of vandalism.

• The Knesset's judges selection panel selected district court judges Miriam Naor and Asher Grunis as the newest additions to Israel's Supreme Court.

May 23

• An explosion near a bus carrying Israelis in the Gaza Strip wounded eight people. Hamas claimed responsibility for the attack, which came a day after Hamas said that it was considering a limited ceasefire.

Jewish delegation meets with Pope John Paul II

CJN News Services

VATICAN CITY — Canadian Jewish Congress president Keith Landy was among a group of international Jewish leaders who met Pope John Paul II last week and expressed hope the meeting may lead to greater access to sensitive Vatican archives from World War II.

"The meeting with John Paul was a historic event for Canadian Jewish Congress," Landy said. "We were cordially received and the Pope spoke warmly of Catholic-Jewish relations. It is a testament to how far we have come in the past couple of decades."

Group presses Pope on WWII archives, anti-Semitism

Landy, who is also vice-chairman of World Jewish Congress, North America was part of a WJC delegation that met with the Pope and Italian prime minister Silvio Berlusconi during a stop in Italy after WJC executive meetings in Jerusalem.

In a private meeting last Thursday with WJC President Edgar Bronfman and the group's secretary-general, Rabbi Israel Singer, the Pope "gave his blessing" to a request to make more of the archives available to scholars, a WJC spokesperson said.

The Pope also endorsed a WJC plan to ask national bishops conferences to adopt public statements against anti-Semitism, as well as a WJC project to work with the Catholic charity Caritas to help needy children in Argentina, the WJC spokesman said.

After the private session, the Pope held a half-hour meeting with a delegation of a dozen international Jewish leaders. Those who took part in the larger audience could not confirm the Pope had endorsed the requests.

Those present at the larger meeting, said the Pope, in fact, did not respond directly when urged to open wartime archives from the pontificate of Pope Pius XII, who Jewish leaders say did not speak out strongly enough against the Holocaust.

The Pope's response caused "some disappointment" among the Jewish leaders, according to those present.

One member of the delegation said Singer and Bronfman also asked the Pope to speak out against suicide bombings and terrorism in Israel.

Bronfman and Singer left Rome immediately after the group audience, but Singer told Reuters that they and the Pope had "agreed on everything."

Bronfman raised the issue of the archives "in a friendly way," Singer told the news agency. "We were encouraging them to open the archives, but it's not like we came in with an aggressive approach. We came in with a negotiated approach."

The Vatican and the Jewish world have clashed over granting scholars access to Vatican archives, in order to clear the air about the Vatican role in the Holocaust. Some prewar archives from the time of Pope Pius XI were unsealed in February, but archives from World War II remain sealed.

In his meeting with the full delegation, the only issue the Pope touched on specifically was the Argentine charity project, for which he expressed "encouragement," the Jewish leaders said.

The Pope also praised Jewish-Christian relations and called for "courage and vision" to foster further "practical" co-operation, they said.

On anti-Semitism, it was suggested that a strong denunciation in a papal homily would help fight the problem, CJC said in a statement.

Those present said the Pope's failure to respond to specific points raised during the group audience disappointed some delegation members.

But Seymour Reich, who attended as past chairman of the International Jewish Committee for Interreligious Consultations, said the meeting was important nonetheless.

"Meetings of this nature are very important for the Jewish community," he told JTA. "They give us the opportunity to share directly with the Pope our concerns – about anti-Semitism, about Israel, about the Vatican archives.

"Even if there is not an immediate direct response, the hope remains that the Pope and his aides will act on it in a positive way, and if that occurs that is one more positive step in our relations with the Vatican," he said.

Last Tuesday, the Vatican newspaper L'Osservatore Romano called the recent spate of Palestinian suicide attacks against Israel a"vicious strategy against dialogue."

In a front-page editorial, the paper said the terrorists' intent was to wreck the U.S.-sponsored "road map" toward Israeli-Palestinian peace before it had a chance to be implemented.

The Vatican audience followed a meeting Wednesday with Italy's prime minister, Silvio Berlusconi, who told a WJC delegation that he would fight anti-Semitism, promote sympathy for Israel in Europe and work to broker Mideast peace.

Speaking less than two months before Italy takes over the six-month rotating presidency of the European Union (EU), Berlusconi said he planned to fly to Israel in early June to meet with Prime Minister Ariel Sharon – but not, apparently, with Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat, whom Israel and the United States accuse of having ties to terrorism.

The CJC's Landy described the meeting with Berlusconi as very fruitful. "He showed a genuine concern for Israel's safety and security. As Italy will assume the [EU presidency on July 1], it can play an important role in pressuring the Palestinian leadership to end terror and incitement," Landy said.

"He also told us that he views Israel as being close to Europe culturally, economically and politically and supports Israel's inclusion in an expanded European Union."

A source who attended the meeting said Berlusconi "agreed that Israel was not getting a fair shake" from Europeans in its conflict with the Palestinians and "said he would work vigorously to change that."

Still shaken by the suicide bombings after its Israel visit, the WJC group wanted to convey to Berlusconi Israel's dismay at what it views as a lack of sympathy on the part of the EU, European governments and the European public for Israel's losses and suffering from Palestinian terrorism.

Berlusconi made "incredible statements" of support for the Jewish state, the source who was at the meeting said.

"He told us that he would stand shoulder to shoulder with [U.S. President George W.] Bush to help broker peace," he said. "As far as I know, no other European leader has come out so unambiguously."

The delegation presented Berlusconi with a copy of the most recent WJC annual report on international anti-Semitism, which details a sharp rise in anti-Jewish violence and sentiment.

"Berlusconi said this was terrible and had to be fought," the source said. "He said we had to take it seriously."

He said Berlusconi also expressed interest in a series of Jewish cultural, educational and communal projects under way in Europe, and asked Cobi Benatoff, the Italian president of the European Council of Jewish Communities, to keep his office informed.

35 silver treasures stolen from Tel Aviv museum

By RONI SINGER
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

TEL AVIV — Thirty-five silver items worth tens of thousands of dollars were stolen last Thursday from Beth Hatefutsoth (Museum of the Jewish Diaspora) in Tel Aviv. The items are part of a temporary exhibit of a private collection belonging to collector Bill Gross.

The break-in was discovered last Friday morning when museum staff found the room in a shambles, with several items missing. The exhibition included 120 Judaica objects, all made of sterling silver, many of them from the 17th, 18th and 19th centuries.

The exhibit, which opened in March, is displayed in two rooms, of which only one was broken into, apparently through a hole drilled in a drywall partition.

"We don't understand how they got in. The place is secured by day and night and motion sensors in the room are supposed to set off an alarm," the museum's public relations director, Asia Reuven said Sunday.

"This was not a highly sophisticated break-in, but it is clear the burglars knew exactly where they were going and what they intend to steal," said police officer Brig. Gen. Ezra Aharon.

The police searched the university grounds where the museum is located and found a backpack next to a fence with several Judaica items and tools that were probably used in the break-in. The police think the stolen items were tossed over the fence before the burglars themselves walked off the campus without raising any suspicion.

The police have no idea how the thieves entered the building, which is closed on Thursdays, but noted there had been a private event, and they plan on questioning the guard who was on duty.

The exhibit of Gross' collection, which he began 40 years ago, was scheduled to be open until October but will close for the time being.

"This is the first break-in we've had and we will have to learn our lessons," Reuven said.

"We came with ideas. We left with a plan"

We had collected so many ideas and suggestions over the past few months, we really needed help. Then we met Susan at the Trust Floor Store. She managed to organize our thoughts into a practical plan. She guided us through their wonderful selection of carpet, tile and wood flooring... delivered on time, and within our budget!

Exhibit zeroes in on Jerusalem, West Bank and Gaza

By MIRIAM CHINSKY

A young Palestinian girl stands in cramped quarters in Gaza's Sh'ati refugee camp while her mother carefully puts the finishing touches on her daughter's hair before she leaves for school.

At Gush Katif, an Israeli settlement, also in Gaza, a father protectively holds his small son's hand as he walks him to school in the watchful company of an armed Israeli soldier.

These two images are among some 40 on display in Holyland, a photographic documentary by Ethan Eisenberg, in the Justina M. Barnicke West Gallery, Hart House, University of Toronto, May 22 to June 19.

Zeroing in on Jerusalem, the West Bank and Gaza, Eisenberg chronicles with his camera the period between 1994 and 2001 because it represents a mix of hope and conflict. Will there be a feasible compromise in the ongoing struggle – one that can bring statehood to the Palestinians with peace and security for Israel? At times it seems within grasp, yet deeply divided fundamentalists and other groups on both sides challenge that premise.

In numerous trips to the areas in question, Eisenberg explored the ways in which these societies have responded to their situations, some accepting and adapting, others deriving bitter satisfaction from fury and hatred. The photographer looks for answers by placing the contentious issues in the less eventful context of daily life.

His black and white photographs give immediacy to his subjects.

There are ingenuous scenes, youngsters celebrating Purim in Jerusalem's Mea Shearim, a Palestinian boy in a sunny field learning how to train a bird to perform.

There are wrenching photos of funerals on both sides.

A sense of spirituality infuses the faces of Israeli women praying at the biblical Tomb of Ruth in Hebron, but two soldiers stand guard on the stone wall behind them.

Perhaps most telling is the 6 a.m. lineup of Palestinian workers at the Erez checkpoint crossing from Gaza to Israel, their faces disclosing apathy, resentment, fatigue.

To realize these portrayals, Eisenberg spent days, weeks and sometimes months, over a seven year span, mingling where he was welcomed or just shooting wherever possible in the disputed sectors.

Eisenberg holds a BA in philosophy from the University of Toronto and a master of fine arts in photography from Concordia University. He is a former photography instructor at George Brown College and Concordia University.

True story about a Jewish neo-Nazi

By LARRY ANKLEWICZ
Special to The CJN

A Jewish boy who turns his back on his background and joins a neo-Nazi group is the basis of the recently released video, The Believer.

What is even more startling is that the film is based on a true story.

This film stirred up quite a controversy when it was first shown at the Sundance Film Festival. Its subject matter precluded it from any significant theatrical run, as distributors shied away from it. It was finally picked up by a cable channel in the United States and received a limited theatrical run in Canada, but it never really hit the mass market.

In the Toronto area, The Believer was presented at the Toronto Jewish Film Festival in 2002, before it was released in theatres.

The film itself centres around the activities of Danny Balint and his hatred of his own people. There are repeated flashbacks to his rebellious and questioning behaviour while attending Jewish school as a child.

The film raises many questions about his neo-Nazi conversion and the ties to the Judaism he detests but cannot break away from completely.

A number of clues to Balint's behaviour are offered throughout the film.

As a child Balint seems to have had problems fitting in and his questioning mind appears to have never been fully satisfied.

In addition, the Balint character appears to be ashamed of the weakness of the Jews.

Torontonian's budding career enhanced by film Spellbound

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Ronnie Eisen never had any doubts about Spellbound.

"I was passionate about it, maybe a little obsessed," said Eisen, a Torontonian and one of the producers of this moving, highly appealing documentary.

"I felt very strongly about it."

As it turns out, Eisen's faith in Spellbound, which opened in Toronto last week, was not misplaced.

• It has appeared in more than 50 festivals, including last year's Toronto International Film Festival, and has won many prizes.

• It was nominated for an Academy Award in the best documentary feature category, being edged out by Michael Moore's Bowling for Columbine, the odds-on-favourite.

• It is doing well at the box office in North America, and in Canada, it is slated to open soon in Vancouver, Montreal, Calgary and Edmonton.

On the face of it, Spellbound's subject – the 1999 National Spelling Bee in Washington, D.C. – might seem eminently forgettable.

But on closer inspection, the film – which charts the lives and fortunes of eight of its contestants – is quite inspirational.

"There is a good deal of intensity and lots of drama," said Eisen, a 1988 graduate of the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT). "It feels like a regular film with a strong narrative and a grand conclusion."

And, as he pointed out, Spellbound reinvents a timeless and beloved story line: the pursuit of the American dream.

Two of the spellers, Angela Arenivar and Ashley White, hail from disadvantaged backgrounds.

Angela's parents, from the ragged Texas panhandle, are struggling Mexican immigrants who do not speak a word of English. Ashley's African-American single mother is bringing her up in a cramped apartment in Washington, D.C.

Ronnie Eisen

Two of the other spellers, Neil Kadakia and Nupur Lala, are of East Indian origin, the son and daughter of hard-working, ferociously motivated and upwardly mobile new Americans.

The sole Jewish contestant, an expressive and bubbly boy named Harry Altman, was raised in a leafy suburb.

Spellbound, which is scheduled to be screened at the Jerusalem Film Festival in July, is the brainchild of Jeff Blitz, a first-time director.

Eisen met him several years ago, when Eisen was working for the Fox television network in prime-time programming and development.

Blitz and his partner, producer Sean Welch, had shot thousands of feet of footage, but could not proceed because they had run out of money while going into debt.

At their request, Eisen tried to raise additional funds by showing potential backers a 10-minute trailer of Spellbound, but there were no takers. "People thought it was cute but that it had no commercial prospects."

Undeterred by the rejections, Eisen kept "pushing" until it got finished.

Once there was a film in hand, Eisen played an integral role in getting it into festivals and helped in getting the film distributed to theatres and TV outlets.

Eisen is cautiously optimistic that Spellbound will be profitable, enabling investors to recoup their investments.

"We're relying strongly on word of mouth," he said.

Most of the eight spellers have seen the film and were impressed, added Eisen, who grew up in the Bathurst-Glencairn area of Toronto.

The youngest of five children, he is the son of Isadore and Batya Eisen.

After graduating from CHAT, Eisen was a one-year exchange student at Hebrew University in Jerusalem. He also studied philosophy and economics at the University of Western Ontario.

In 1995, he joined his brother, Andrew, a film editor, in Los Angeles. "I had always been interested in the entertainment business," he said.

Snagging a job at the Creative Artists Agency (CAA), Eisen worked in its packaging department, which represents writers and directors and packages shows for network and cable television.

"I learned how shows are created and put together," he said.

No less important, Eisen also learned about the relationship between agents, agencies and TV networks.

After CAA, he moved to Fox and later joined the Endeavor Agency, representing writers and directors in new media companies.

While there, he joined forces with Blitz in the making of Spellbound.

Eisen left Endeavor to focus on independent projects. From a strictly legal point of view, agents are not allowed to function as producers.

He is currently involved in several projects, but is not at liberty to discuss them. "In this business, unless there's something, there's nothing," he said.

Eisen does not know what tomorrow will bring, but he hopes that a project of Spellbound's calibre is in his future.

Believer is fascinating and challenging

While this is not always a comfortable film to watch, it is always fascinating and challenging.

Canadian actor, Ryan Gosling gives a brilliant performance as Danny Balint and seems to convey the thin psychological tightrope his character is walking. Billy Zane, Theresa Russell and Summer Phoenix provide strong support.

It has taken a considerable length of time for The Believer to make its way onto video but it has now arrived and in Canada has been released by Sony Music Video and should be on the shelves of most good video stores now.

Canadian actor Ryan Gosling gives a brilliant performance as Danny Balint, a Jewish boy who turns his back on his background and joins a neo-Nazi group.

JEWISH BOOK AWARDS CEREMONY TO RECALL NAZI BOOK BURNINGS OF 1933

The 15th annual Canadian Jewish Book Awards ceremony gets under way in less than two weeks with a short memorial recalling the Nazi burning of books in more than 40 German communities 70 years ago.

The rest of the evening will be devoted to elevating books, authors and the literary and scholary arts to the usual high pedestal upon which all lovers of literature and civilization rightfully place them.

As usual, there will be few surprises and little – if any – suspense at the ceremony, the winners having been announced weeks in advance. For attendees, much of the joy consists in watching a diverse collection of under-unappreciated scribes and scholars from across Canada get the recognition they so richly deserve.

The evening's most prestigious award, the Martin and Beatrice Fischer Prize in Fiction, goes to Vancouver writer Nancy Richler for her novel Your Mouth Is Lovely, published by HarperFlamingo Canada.

(Eye on Arts has not yet determined whether Nancy is related to Emma Richler, whose first novel Sister Crazy bagged the fiction prize last year and who is part of the extraordinarily well-lettered clan sired by the late Canadian novelist Mordecai Richler.)

Ten other prize winners have been announced:

Montreal journalist Henry T. Aubin wins in the history category for The Rescue of Jerusalem: the Alliance Between Hebrews and Africans in 701 BC (Doubleday Canada) while Theresa and Albert Moritz win in the category of Canadian Jewish history for The World's Most Dangerous Woman (Subway Books), a study of Emma Goldman's time in Canada;

CBC Radio producer Karen Levine captures the children's literature prize for Hana's Suitcase (Second Story Press) while Torontonian Vivian J. Kaplan collects the biography/memoir prize for Ten Green Bottles: Vienna to Shanghai, Journey of Fear and Hope (Robin Brass Studio);

Karen Levine captured the children's literature prize for Hana's Suitcase.

James A. Diamond, chair of Jewish Studies at the University of Waterloo, wins the award in biblical/rabbinic scholarship for Maimonides and the Hermeneutics of Concealment (SUNY Press) while University of Calgary professor Adrienne Kertzer takes the award in scholarship on a Jewish subject for My Mother's Voice: Children, Literature and the Holocaust (Broadview Press);

University of Toronto professor emeritus N. N. Shneidman wins in the category of Holocaust history for The Three Tragic Heros of the Vilnius Ghetto: Witenberg, Sheinbaum, Gens (Mosaic Press) while Joil Alpern wins in the category of Holocaust memoir for No One Awaiting Me: Two Brothers Defy Death During the Holocaust in Romania (University of Calgary Press);

Montreal Yiddish scholar Pierre Anctil takes the Yiddish translation prize for Le Montréal Juif Entre les Deux Guerres (Septentrion), his masterful translation into French of Montreal journalist Israel Medresh's 1964 original, while Toronto poet-psychiatrist Ron Charach receives the poetry prize for his collection Dungenessque (Signature Editions).

The evening's MC is Bernard Katz. Guest celebrity reader Evan Solomon, host of the CBC's popular Hot Type, reads selections from Richler's winning novel.

The book awards committee, co-chaired by Frances Mandel and Miriam Webb, had a "very challenging, though rewarding" task in choosing the winners from more than 50 books submitted. "It was an embarrassment of riches that proclaims the vitality of Jewish writing and scholarship in Canada," Mandel said.

Everyone is invited to attend this notable free event, which takes place Monday, June 9, 7:30 p.m. in the Leah Posluns Theatre, Bathurst Jewish Community Centre, 4588 Bathurst St. A reception follows the ceremony, at which books may be purchased and possibly signed by their authors.

Names in the News

• A four-day conference at Britain's Cambridge University in April focused on the novels of Aharon Appelfeld on the occasion of his 70th birthday. The Romanian-born Holocaust survivor travelled from Israel to attend the conference, the first such gathering at Cambridge to focus on modern Israeli literature.

• New York's YIVO Institute for Jewish Research honoured Imre Kertesz and Moshe Safdie this month with lifetime achievement awards. Kertesz, a Jewish-Hungarian survivor of Auschwitz and last year's Nobel laureate in literature, is the author of Kaddish for a Child Not Born and other works of Holocaust fiction. The Israeli-born Safdie, who moved to Montreal at 15, is renowned for grand and innovative architectural projects such as Montreal's Habitat, Ottawa's National Gallery and the Western Wall Plaza in Jerusalem.

At the Galleries

• 3X3, an exhibition of new paintings by Suzanne Dennis, Sheila Bedoukian and Janice Hurlbut, is on view at Gate 403 Bar and Grill, 403 Roncesvalles Ave., June 5 through 29. Opening June 5, 6 to 9 p.m.

South African artist finds new home in Canada

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Leon Yehuda Soriano is practically in a class all by himself.

He is a charter member of an elite group of artists whose work hangs in a royal palace.

In 1979, when he was a resident of South Africa, one of his paintings was purchased for the palatial home of the king of Swaziland, a small, landlocked African nation.

It is hardly surprising that Soriano's painting graces a monarch's residence. He is a new immigrant to Canada, but he is among Africa's most distinguished artists.

He has exhibited extensively, and private collectors in Africa, Europe, Australia and the United States have bought his works.

Soriano's biography is listed in two standard reference books, Collectors Guide to Art and Artists in South Africa and Art and Artists in South Africa.

Last year, his solo exhibit at Harbourfront overlapped with the Ashkenaz festival of new Yiddish culture. Most recently, his work appeared at a Hummingbird Centre fundraiser for the Canadian Opera Company.

Something of a wandering Jew, Soriano was born in Harare, Zimbabwe, when the country was still known as Rhodesia.

The Soriano clan has deep roots in Africa. His maternal grandfather, Naphtalie Levy, was a pioneer in Rhodesia, and his mother was a native Rhodesian. His father, an Egyptian, immigrated to Rhodesia to join his family.

Troubled by the thrust of political developments in Zimbabwe, Soriano moved to neighbouring South Africa in 1978. For the same reason, he settled in Canada in 2000. Before his arrival in Toronto, he lived in Vancouver.

Although he has been here only a relatively short time, Soriano is already impressed by the artistic possibilities of Canada's varied landscapes.

"I am excited by Canadian scenery in all its seasons," said Soriano, who belongs to the Federation of Canadian Artists.

Influenced by Picasso, Matisse and Klee, as well as by ancient African traditions, Soriano is preoccupied with the human form.

"I frequently do not distinguish between the sexes, thus giving my work a universal appeal," he explained.

He works in mixed media and, recently, he turned to etching. " I particularly enjoy hand colouring the plates, using printing inks in a wide range of colours."

Leon Yehuda Soriano

Being a product of Africa, Soriano tends to infuse his paintings, collages, acrylics and gouaches with warmth and light.

As he likes to put it, he was drawn to "pictures" at a very early age.

"I always felt the need to express myself in colour. I didn't make a conscious decision to be an artist. I just painted and studied painting and drawing."

After attending the Michaelis School of Fine Arts at the University of Cape Town and the Durban College of Arts and Crafts, he continued his studies at the London College of Printing and Design.

In Zimbabwe and South Africa, he supported himself as a painter and a teacher. He takes pride in the fact that more than 80 per cent of his students found gainful employment as artists.

Soriano returned to teaching after his Harbourfront exhibition.

"Mainly as a result of this show, I was able to get my teaching studio going in Toronto. My classes are small and I concentrate on individual tuition. I allow each person to grow in their own direction rather than giving instruction to a class as a whole."

A strong colourist, he encourages students to use colour imaginatively.

He also urges them to frame their works. "It is important that they should not hide their work away but feel proud and experience the varied responses they evoke."

Soriano, who appeared in Rhodesia's last international art show, has not been back to Zimbabwe in about a decade.

Yet Soriano, whose sister still lives in Zimbabwe, has no regrets.

"The state of affairs in Zimbabwe at the moment is too ghastly for words," he observed. "There is no petrol available and food is sometimes hard to get. The cost of living has gone up 300 per cent this year, and the currency is worth so little. My friends and family are struggling."

He said he is glad to be in Toronto. "I am very satisfied with my decision to come to Canada." Next month, he will be eligible for Canadian citizenship.

Soriano can be reached via email at leonsoriano@yahoo.ca

Tenor with the voice of a soprano

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Erik Kurmangaliev, a Russian counter-tenor with a register almost like that of a mezzo-soprano, is making his first Canadian appearance in Toronto, June 9 at the Beth Tzedec Synagogue, 1700 Bathurst St., 7 p.m.

Russian vocalist Erik Kurmangaliev

The internationally acclaimed soloist will also perform in Montreal, June 14 at the Théâtre National, 1220 Ste. Catherine E. at 7 p.m.

Kurmangaliev is in the Guinness Book of Records as a result of his unsurpassed ability to perform the repertoire normally reserved for the female contralto.

Frequently compared to the legendary Fedora Barbieri, his impressive vocal dynamics have won him innumerable awards.

Kurmangaliev will perform classical and popular music by Handel, Glinka, Tchaikovsky, Rossini, Bizet, Strauss, Offenbach and others. He will be joined by soprano, Iana Ivanilova from the Bolshoi Theatre in Moscow, with a string quartet and Marina Belova on piano.

The young Russian, who has a charming and serene stage personality, was born in Kulsary, West Kazakhstan. He did post-graduate studies at the Moscow State Conservatoire and made his first solo debut in 1980 in the Great Hall of the Leningrad Philharmonic. He was a laureate of the International competition in the Netherlands in 1987 and has performed throughout Russia, Belgium, Hungary, Yugoslavia, France, Greece and the United States.

He received the best actor of the year award in 1992 for his astonishing performance of the role of Song Liling in M. Butterfly, where he sang two arias from Madam Butterfly by Puccini.

"Erik is the most outstanding vocalist I have ever heard," said Ella Tcheloznova, one of the producers of the Toronto concert. "His range is phenomenal and we are thrilled that he is coming to Toronto."

Tickets for the concert are $20 and $40. For more information or to order tickets call 416-491-3014, 416-821-8322 or 416-574-4700.

Zaka raising its profile in Toronto

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Over the past few years, men wearing fluorescent yellow jackets have become all too familiar to viewers of Israeli news. First to arrive at disaster scenes, they provide first aid to survivors before turning to the grisly task of collecting for burial the human remains of terrorist victims.

Yet, for all the good work it does, ZAKA, a Hebrew acronym for Identification of Victims of Disaster, receives only minimal funding from the Israeli government. With its rescue services increasingly in demand, the volunteer organization has turned to Jewish communities around the world for financial support.

Two ZAKA representatives were in Toronto recently to address a small, by-invitation-only dessert reception hosted by philanthropist Rachelle Bronfman. A few dozen guests gave $100 each to support the volunteer group, but organizers hope the evening will do more than just raise money. They are looking to take the first step toward a more permanent organizational structure. Freelance journalist Marshall Shapiro, who has been working virtually on his own to create a local support system for ZAKA, hopes Canada will soon have a formal, permanent group of volunteers on the Toronto scene.

Bronfman said she became aware of ZAKA's work after viewing a documentary on suicide bombers and seeing the work of the men with white latex gloves and yellow jackets. "They are really out there," she said. "What they see is just unimaginable. They do it because they believe in it."

She met with Shapiro and agreed to host the information evening and spread the word about ZAKA among her contacts. She hopes some of them may form the nucleus of a ZAKA support group.

ZAKA spokesman Yisroel Stefansky, who visited Toronto last summer, said the organization is reaching out to Jewish communities in France, Germany, Belgium and Australia as well as Canada. It already maintains a more formal, incorporated support group in New York City, which has raised funds for ambulances and which involves Jewish schools in smaller fundraising efforts.

Currently, ZAKA can call on 800 volunteers across Israel to respond to disasters that have been instigated by terrorists or are the result of more mundane circumstances. Stefansky was recently called to Texas, where he took part in the retrieval of the remains of Israeli astronaut Ilan Ramon, who was killed this past February when NASA's space shuttle disintegrated on re-entry.

ZAKA volunteers are organized into various response teams, Stefansky said. These include a motorcycle unit (often the first to arrive on disaster scenes), a fire department unit, an ambulance unit, a rescue and recovery unit and a chesed shel emes unit (to identify victims). Stefansky belongs to the organization's sixth department, the recently inaugurated diving unit.

ZAKA was founded in 1995 after several bombing attacks. Describing its work to the assembled guests, sometimes in graphic detail, Stefansky said the group's founders felt the victims must be accorded the dignity of a full burial with all body parts interred. "We have to go out there, collect them, identify them and give them a proper burial," he said. "That's what people expect."

Doing so can be difficult, he said. Sometimes the body parts and blood are so embedded in surrounding objects, such as a bus, that "you bury half a bus if the blood and flesh won't come off. It's hard for us, but we know we have to do it," he said. "We do it because somebody has to do it and it is avodat kodesh [holy work]."

ZAKA's international reach was demonstrated last July when Stefansky and a colleague, who were visiting Toronto last summer, were called upon when David Rosenzweig was murdered outside King David Pizza, a midtown kosher restaurant.

ZAKA hopes to raise funds for an ambulance dedicated to Rosenzweig's memory. Speaking at the reception, Chavie Rosenzweig, David's widow, said ZAKA's "virtuous and noble tasks on behalf of David were a source of strength."

The presence in Toronto of Stefansky and his colleague at an excruciatingly trying time was divinely orchestrated, she said. "ZAKA epitomizes the unit of Jews through its heroic efforts."

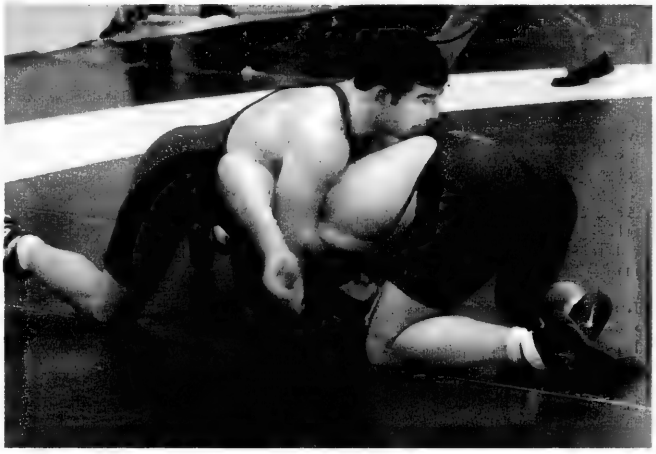
Wrestler gearing up for run at Olympic team

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Danny Einhorn has been grappling with Daniel Igali for a little while now and he thinks he can take the great one down.

Yes, it's true that Igali has been nursing a neck injury for some time and it's also true the 2000 Olympic gold medal wrestler isn't quite up to par. But Einhorn has been knocking on the door at the top of Canadian freestyle wrestling for a few years now and he is confident that he can eclipse the Nigerian-born sports icon.



In photo at right, Danny Einhorn (seen above) gets the upper hand on an opponent in a recent wrestling contest.

Trouble is, there's another hot young gun on the scene, Hungarian-born Zoltan Hunyady, who has bested Einhorn at the Canadian Senior National Championships in both freestyle and greco-roman just a few weeks ago.

Competition is tough, Einhorn acknowledges, but the 23-year-old refuses to be dissuaded from his long term goal: mounting the medal podium at the 2004 Olympics in Athens.

Heady stuff for a former student of Associated Hebrew Schools, but since Grade 9, Einhorn has been honing his skills and getting the expert training he needs to fulfill his dream.

A carded athlete – he receives $1,000 a month as a member of the national team – Einhorn attends Simon Fraser University in Burnaby, B.C., a suburb of Vancouver, where he studies molecular and cell biology.

He's also a member of the school's top-rated wrestling team, the Clan, which competes in the NAIA, U.S. college's second tier of schools behind the NCAA.

Simon Fraser also takes on Division I schools like Oregon State and Pacific Lutheran, and Einhorn has done very well at international meets.

The Clan also competes against Canadian schools and earlier in the spring, Einhorn won the gold medal at the CIS National Wrestling Championships in St. Catharines.

Even prior to that, his list of accomplishments is long. A former Junior National champion (18 to 20-year-olds), he was also the country's juvenile national champion.

In 1998, he finished 14th at the junior world's, wrestling in the 69-kg grouping.

Today he fights in the 74-kg (162-lb) class and at five-foot-eight, relies on the low centre of gravity afforded by his compact stature, his strength and his "explosive" moves to humble his opponents.

Being lower to the ground, he can "shoot to their legs more effectively" and take them down, he said.

Einhorn turned to wrestling at the suggestion of his teachers and he trained mostly at the Metro Toronto Wrestling Club. Earlier, he'd dabbled in judo and when his friends took up wrestling, Einhorn joined them even though at the time he didn't know the Olympic version from the WWF.

He excelled pretty quickly and when he was only 16, he joined the Canadian team at the Maccabiah Games in Israel, fighting in the 69-kg freestyle category against much older athletes. He finished fourth, eventually losing to a onetime NCAA champ who won the gold.

Towards the end of his high school days, he was recruited by U.S. and Canadian colleges. He chose Simon Fraser for its reputations both scholastically and in wrestling. He thrives on the three to four hours he puts in every day in the gym and he looks forward to the weekend meets.

"I like the competition," he said. "There's always a learning process. It's like chess. You can perfect one move, you can try to take someone down, but they can counter.

"It's a mentally taxing sport. It's mentally tough and it makes you a better person."

Saudi, Yemeni table tennis players refuse to play Israeli

By Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

PARIS — Two Arab competitors refused to play against an Israeli at the Table Tennis World Championships in Paris last week.

On Tuesday, Saudi Nabeel Al-Magahwi, ranked 432nd in the world, did not show up at the table to play Israeli Guy Elensky, ranked 360th.

A day earlier, Hani Al-Hammani, ranked 985th, did arrive but refused to play when he learned Elensky's nationality.

"At this rate, I'll win a medal," Elensky quipped. The Israeli team has formally protested to the International Table Tennis Federation, which could throw the Saudi and Yemeni teams out of the tournament.

DearKarilani

Dear Karilani,

I am trying to decide which university to attend. I have plenty of information about the academics at the universities I am considering. However, I have been hearing a lot about anti-Zionism and anti-Semitism on campuses and am wondering whether I should be taking this into consideration. I do not want to base my decision solely on this factor, as academics are important to me, but I am afraid of being in a situation where I have to face anti-Semitism daily. How can I get information on which universities are the most Jewish-friendly?

Fearful

Dear Fearful,

The fact that you are thinking about this issue shows it is something you should look into. I get the feeling that if you make a mistake and choose to go to a school that has a lot of anti-Semitism, you will be extremely unhappy. You don't have to worry about compromising the academic side of the university experience to accommodate your desire for a Jewish-friendly environment, because many schools are both academically excellent and Jewish-friendly.

Try to find Jewish students at each school you are considering and speak to them. It is best if the students are people you know at least a little bit, because they are likely to be more honest than someone you have never met before. However, if you don't know anyone at a particular school, ask your friends if they do. If you're really stuck, find out about where graduates from your school have gone and try to meet with one of them.

Ask what they have noticed about the general attitude toward Jews at their university. Find out whether they are involved in Jewish activities and organizations such as Hillel, because someone who is involved will probably be more interested and aware of what is really going on. Take a look at the Hillel Web site for each university – does it look like there are a lot of people involved? That's a good sign.

Most importantly, be as honest as you can be with yourself. If there is a university that looks good, but you get the feeling that anti-Semitism is going to be a problem, try to look for a similar academic program elsewhere. You don't want to spend four years defending yourself instead of studying.

DR. JOHN TRACHTENBERG

Fleck/Tanenbaum Chair in Prostatic Diseases
Director, Prostate Centre, Princess Margaret Hospital
Professor, Department of Surgery, University of Toronto

Dr. John Trachtenberg was born in Montreal in 1949 and received his B.Sc., M.D. & C.M. from McGill University in 1973. He completed his urologic residency at McGill University and then a fellowship in prostatic disease at Johns Hopkins University.

Dr. Trachtenberg is currently Professor of Surgery and Medical Imaging at the University of Toronto. He holds the prestigious Fleck/Tanenbaum Chair in Prostatic Diseases at the University of Toronto and University Health Network. He is the Director of the Prostate Centre at the Princess Margaret Hospital of the University Health Network and the Director of Prostate Services at the Murray Koffler Urologic Wellness Centre at the Mount Sinai Hospital. He acts as a consultant to the Urology Department at several other hospitals, as well as the Ontario Cancer Foundation. Dr. Trachtenberg has published numerous papers and books, and sits on many hospital, university and scientific committees throughout North America and Europe.

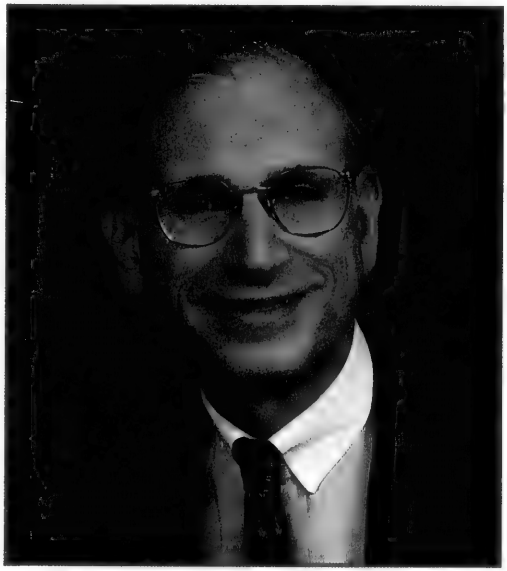
His accomplishments have earned him 18 awards, including Man of the Year in Sciences and Medicine from the Canadian Prostate Cancer Research Fund.

He has developed novel, minimally invasive surgical techniques for the treatment of prostate cancer and was instrumental in the development of the prostate specific Clinical Research Program at the Princess Margaret Hospital. He is currently collaborating with Weizmann scientists, Professor Avigdor Scherz and Professor Yoram Salomon, in conducting clinical trials on a prostate cancer treatment developed at the Weizmann Institute of Science.

GUEST SPEAKER

STUART E. EIZENSTAT

Chairman International Board of Governors
Weizmann Institute of Science



Stuart Eizenstat has been directing his considerable talents to public service roles for over 35 years. He has served in several positions in the administrations of United States Presidents Kennedy, Johnson, Carter, Clinton and George W. Bush.

During the Clinton presidency, Eizenstat served variously as U.S. Ambassador to the European Union; Under Secretary of Commerce for International Trade; Under Secretary of State for Economic, Business and Agricultural Affairs; and Deputy Secretary of the Treasury.

As Special Envoy of the State Department for Property Restitution in Central and Eastern Europe and as Special Representative of the President and Secretary of State for Holocaust Issues, he helped secure the return of thousands of properties to the Jewish communities of newly democratic Eastern Europe. Through his efforts, Nazi-looted art was returned to its rightful owners from over 40 nations. He also negotiated a $5 billion settlement for Holocaust survivors with Swiss, German, Austrian and French banks and authorities.

In order to complete the implementation of several of his agreements, Eizenstat was asked by the Bush administration to stay on as Special Advisor to the State Department – a role he filled on an unpaid basis for six months.

Eizenstat now heads the international practice of the Washington-based law firm Covington & Burling.

Eizenstat has written a well reviewed book on his Holocaust negotiations, Imperfect Justice: Looted Assets, Slave Labor, and the Unfinished Business of World War II.

Associated with the Weizmann Institute of Science on local, national and international levels for many years, Eizenstat became Chairman of the International Board of Governors of the Institute in 2002.

In his inaugural address he stated, "We face new challenges but even greater opportunities because of the extraordinary contributions being made by Weizmann to Israel and the world. It is our responsibility to fulfil the dream of the founders of the Weizmann Institute: that this Institute would be at the centre of a peaceful Middle East, supplying scientific knowledge and know-how to improve the lives of the people of Israel, their Palestinian and Arab neighbours, and the world at large. We shall continue the work so many before us have done to convert their dream into reality."

Stuart E. Eizenstat will be the guest speaker on June 19 at the Sheraton Centre Hotel in Toronto when Weizmann Canada and the Princess Margaret Hospital Foundation honour Dr. John Trachtenberg.

Greetings on behalf of my Co-Chairs, our Honourary Patrons and the Tribute Committee.

I was honoured to have been asked to serve as Gala Chair and work with a dedicated team of talented volunteers and professionals in support of two outstanding institutions. The fruits of our labours and the generosity of many will be applied toward the establishment of a new research chair at the Weizmann Institute of Science and will help fund research and treatment initiatives at Princess Margaret Hospital.

Like many men and their families, I have a personal reason for wanting to honour John and support his work. I am not only an admirer of his, but a patient as well. I share this distinction with two of my Co-Chairs – Gerry Halbert and Leo Goldhar. With compassion and honesty, John has treated literally thousands of men with prostate cancer. Each patient was seen as an individual human being, not a disease, and their families were involved members of the treatment team.

So many of us owe a deep debt of gratitude, and sometimes our lives, to John and those with whom he works. This tribute to John comes not just from those involved, but from all his patients on whose behalf I wish to give my deepest thanks for his skills and his humanity.

Recognition must go as well to the dedicated healthcare professionals at The Prostate Centre, of which John serves as its first Chair.

The renowned American jurist, Oliver Wendall Holmes, wrote that the mind "once stretched, never goes back to its original dimensions." I believe the same can be said for one's heart. The fact that so many from different backgrounds have come together to honour John is proof of this.

Sincerely,

Ronald Appleby, Q.C.
Gala Chair

It is my great pleasure to pay tribute to Dr. John Trachtenberg.

Dr. John Trachtenberg, holder of the Fleck/Tanenbaum Chair in Prostatic Diseases and Director of the Prostate Centre, Princess Margaret Hospital, University Health Network, is deeply involved in researching and implementing alternative approaches to the treatment of cancer. By studying the effects of alternative treatments Dr. Trachtenberg and his colleagues positively impact the entire field of care for patients with cancer. Dr. Trachtenberg's devotion to investigating prostate cancer has a broad impact and his discoveries assist other specialists in tailoring treatments for all varieties of cancer.

As a member of the Prostate Cancer Alliance of Canada, Dr. Trachtenberg researches various methods of treating cancer, including hormone treatment, surgery and adjuvant therapy, or the use of additional forms of treatment to augment surgical therapy.

John Trachtenberg is an outstanding surgeon, researcher and leader. It is fitting that he is being honoured by The Canadian Society for The Weizmann Institute of Science.

On behalf of all his colleagues at University Health Network, congratulations.

Sincerely,

Tom Closson
President & Chief Executive Officer
University Health Network

As Chairman of The Canadian Society for the Weizmann Institute of Science, and on behalf of the Board of Directors, I am very pleased to invite you to what, to my mind, will truly be an historic event.

Historic as it marks the first time that Weizmann Canada partners with The Princess Margaret Hospital Foundation – a superb organization supporting a truly world-class hospital with which we are proud to be associated.

Historic as it will also recognize the first time that the Weizmann Institute and Princess Margaret Hospital have collaborated in a program of research and clinical trials – especially one that holds so much promise.

Historic because we will all come together to honour Dr. John Trachtenberg. John is as rightfully worthy of our esteem for his clinical expertise and dedication as he is for his humanity. I can personally think of no one more richly deserving of the honour we will bestow upon him.

Finally and most important, it is my hope and prayer that the evening will be an historic event because future generations will look back and acknowledge that on that night, in Toronto, two communities came together to support groundbreaking work that became the standard in the successful treatment of prostate and other cancers.

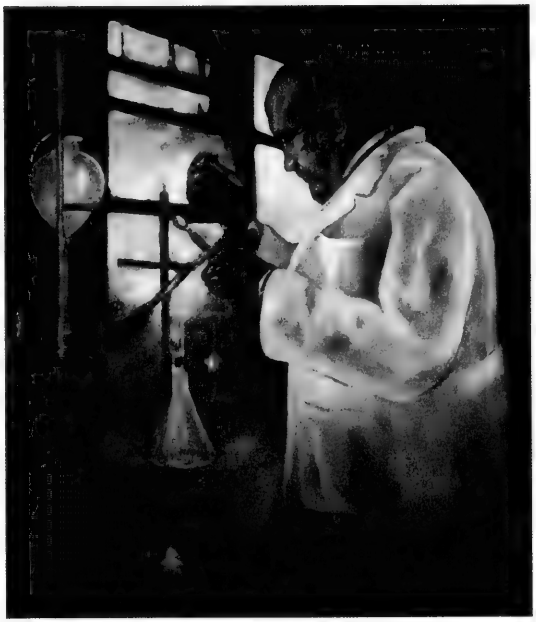
Sincerely,

H. Thomas Beck, C.M., O.Ont.
Chairman
The Canadian Society for the Weizmann Institute of Science

THE WEIZMANN INSTITUTE OF SCIENCE

Science for the Benefit of Humanity

Located in Rehovot, Israel, the Weizmann Institute of Science is one of the top-ranking multidisciplinary research institutions in the world. Noted for its wide-ranging exploration of the sciences and technology, the Institute gathers together 2,500 scientists from more than 32 countries, technicians and research students devoted to adventuring into the unknown. In their labs, located in a landscaped campus environment, they share a vision: To better understand nature and our place within it.



Doctor Chaim Weizmann

Inquisitiveness is their predominant trait. It is this curiosity that propelled homo sapiens up the slope of evolution. It is this driving curiousity that sees man and woman through their greatest discoveries. It is the force which pushed earliest civilization to develop agriculture, to learn how to build shelter, to create the written word, to harness electricity to the wagon of industry and commerce, to contemplate far-off galaxies, to find the cure for disease, to form new materials, and to decipher the genetic code stamped on all living things, be they plant or animal.

The desire to continue in this forward stride is the force behind every Institute scientist's efforts to penetrate realms formerly incomprehensible to humankind. And what dwells in these domains? The unknown. The only certainty: revelation encountered along their path.

THE BEGINNING

The present-day campus of more than 50 major buildings grew out of the modest Daniel Sieff Research Institute founded in 1934 by Israel and Rebecca Sieff in memory of their son. The driving force behind its establishment was the Institute's first president, Dr. Chaim Weizmann, a noted chemist who later became the first president of Israel.

On November 2, 1949, with the agreement of the Sieff family, the Institute was renamed and formally dedicated as the Weizmann Institute of Science.

A BROAD SCOPE

Today's Institute comprises 18 departments organized into five faculties: Biology, Biophysics-Biochemistry, Chemistry, Physics and Mathematical Sciences, as well as the Feinberg Graduate School.

The Institute has also established a series of interdisciplinary research centers to promote the wide-ranging collaboration characteristic of today's frontier fields.

A technology transfer arm, Yeda Research and Development Co. Ltd., promotes the commercial development of Institute research.

A Record of Firsts

In a country driven by a pioneering spirit, the Weizmann Institute has forged ahead as a pioneer on the local science scene.

The Institute was the first to introduce cancer research in Israel, to design and build a computer, to establish a nuclear physics department, a research accelerator for the study of atomic nuclei, an academically linked office for technology transfer, and a science-based industrial park. Recent pioneering projects include the nation's first – and so far only – submicron research facility for sophisticated electronic component development, and an advanced solar energy research complex, one of only a handful in the world. The Institute has been – and continues to be – a pioneer in science education.

Closing in on Cancer

Much of all Weizmann Institute research is aimed, in one way or another, at conquering cancer.

The multipronged attack encompasses studies in cell differentiation, growth regulation, genetics, molecular therapeutics and diagnostic approaches. Geneticists, biophysicists, immunologists and cell biologists collaborate in this interdisciplinary effort.

It was just such an interdisciplinary effort that brought Professors Avigdor Scherz of the Institute's Plant Sciences Department and Yoram Salomon of the Biological Regulation Department to collaborate on the development of the experimental drug Tookad.

Among other seminal achievements of Weizmann scientists is the identification of the genetic origins of some types of leukemia as well as the discovery of genes that induce or suppress malignancies. Institute scientists also were among the first to demonstrate that cancer development is a multistage process and that certain cancerous cells can be made to revert to normal.

Today's research includes magnetic resonance spectroscopy to non-invasively detect and help treat breast cancer, photodynamic therapy for attacking melanomas, prostate and other cancers, development of a lung cancer vaccine, a bone marrow transplant technique for treating leukemia, as well as projects bearing on ovarian cancer and brain tumors.

Canadian Center for the Energies and Applied Research

Harnessing the Sun

The challenge of harnessing inexhaustible, pollution-free solar power remains a top priority in sun-drenched, resource-poor Israel.

The Weizmann Institute is equipped with one of the most advanced solar research facilities in the world, enabling Institute experts to pursue the development of new cost-efficient ways to harness, store and transport the sun's energy. Indeed, the Canadian Institute for the Energies and Applied Sciences, including The Beck Complex, is one of the campus's most prominent structures.

Current projects reflect ambitious goals: collecting sunlight in bright, arid regions and piping it as energy-rich gas to energy-consuming regions; producing hydrogen from water for use as a clean fuel; creating solar-pumped lasers with significant potential in satellite communications; building solar-heated gas turbines to generate electric power; and developing sophisticated solar cells.

Inside the Atom, Out in Space

Weizmann Institute physicists are part of the world-wide quest to unravel the secrets of our physical world. Institute physicists first proposed the existence of an elementary particle called the top quark and contributed to the identification of another particle called a gluon.

Teaming up with colleagues from around the world, they are conducting advanced experiments at the European Laboratory for Particle Physics (CERN) in Geneva and at the DESY Electron Synchrotron Laboratory in Hamburg. Others are studying the mysterious origins of cosmic rays or harnessing lasers for a multitude of powerful new uses.

In the new field of submicron research, Weizmann physicists are investigating semiconductors in the hope of understanding the role of quantum mechanics in large objects. They are growing crystals in layers no more than a few atoms thick and hold the world record for purity of gallium arsenide crystals, which may prove essential for a new type of electronics based on quantum mechanics. Research in this field will result in stunningly smaller and faster computer chips for tomorrow's advanced electronics industry.

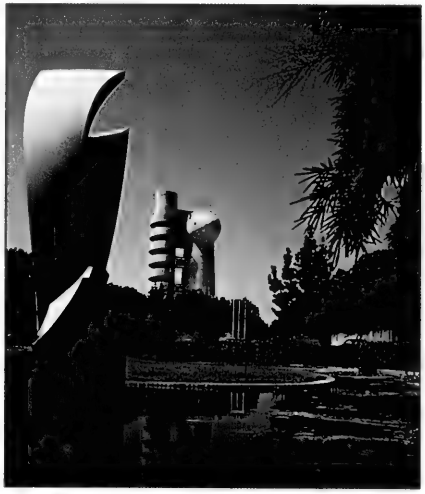
Atomic and sub-atomic particle research at the Institute is undertaken at the Koffler Accelerator at the Canadian Center of Nuclear Physics – also one of the most prominent structures on the campus.

Across the Life Span

Weizmann Institute biomedical research embraces the entire human life span, from prenatal problems to the infirmities of old age. Amniocentesis, now widely used to diagnose problems in the fetus, grew out of research originally carried out at the Institute.

Continuing Institute studies are leading to a greater understanding of embryonic development, low birth weight, Down syndrome, muscular dystrophy and lissencephaly.

The Bioinformatics Unit on campus is participating in the international Human Genome Project to decipher the 3 billion "letters" of the human genetic code.



A view of the Koffler Accelerator of the Canada Center of Nuclear Physics

Institute researchers are also developing treatments for auto-immune diseases, including lupus, rheumatoid arthritis and juvenile diabetes.

And two new substances for the treatment of multiple sclerosis have originated recently from Institute research. Other Institute-developed drugs are helping to arrest hepatitis B, a widespread viral disease.

The last word in biomedical research – physicists using their different perspective and tools to uncover the roots of biological phenomena – can be witnessed at the Weizmann Institute. It is hoped that this new approach will lead to drugs with increased precision and efficiency.

Inside the Brain

Basic research is elucidating brain structure and function and neurological disease. A brain tissue communication receptor suspected of involvement in both Alzheimer's disease and amyotrophic lateral sclerosis (ALS or Lou Gehrig's disease) has been isolated at the Institute.

An effective treatment of spinal and optic nerve injuries may ultimately result from successful experiments with nerve regeneration.

Institute scientists developed new brain imaging techniques which have for the first time made it possible to visualize the activity of millions of interconnected groups of neurons, enabling researchers to literally observe brain function with unprecedented resolution in time and space.

Discoveries revealing how the brain stores memories of taste and flavor may one day help overcome appetite disorders and lead to the development of medications to strengthen memory.

Higher Nutrition, Lower Pollution

Weizmann Institute plant biologists are working on improving food crops while reducing the use of chemical fertilizers and herbicides.

Hybrid cucumber varieties with high resistance to viral disease have been developed at the Institute, as have the world's first hybrid melons based on specially bred parent plants.

Together with experts from Egypt and the United States, an Institute team is fighting devastating parasitic weeds that threaten staple crops in the Middle East and Africa, while other Institute plant specialists are using genes from wild wheat native to the Fertile Crescent to achieve dramatic improvements in the nutritional value of cultivated wheat.

Taking a global view, an Institute group is assessing the effect of the damaged ozone layer on the essential process of photosynthesis.

Computer Pioneers

Back in 1954, Weizmann mathematicians built WEIZAC, the first computer in Israel and one of the first computers in the world.

Accomplishments of the present generation include the development of special means to prevent unauthorized access to confidential computer data and commercial satellite TV and the formulation of new high-volume fiber-optic communications methods.

Innovative techniques for studying human arm motions are influencing the design of artificial limbs, advancing our understanding of motor control diseases, and aiding in the design of controlled motion in robots.

Institute software facilitates the development of sophisticated systems such as those used in aircraft, space shuttles and nuclear power stations.

Weizmann scientists have twice won the prestigious A.M. Turing Award, regarded in academic circles as the "Nobel Prize" of computer science.

New Products and Processes

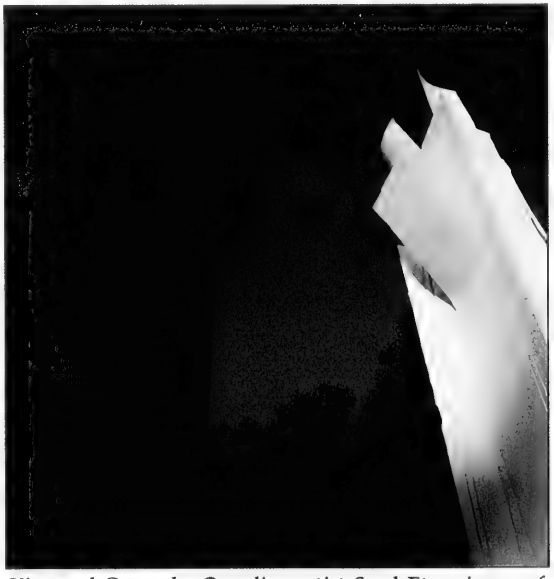
Chemistry was the first discipline at the Weizmann Institute. Weizmann chemists continue to make their mark in areas ranging from the elucidation of such basic structures of life as that of the ribosome (the body's protein factory) to the development of innovative industrial processes.

Among the everyday products and processes emerging from Weizmann labs are enzymes tied to synthetic resins that aid in the manufacture of synthetic antibiotics, corn syrup and other materials.

Brittle ceramic superconductors have been endowed with metal-like ductility, thus increasing the possibility of using them as frictionless ballbearings. Inorg-anic materials with soccerball-like structures, first identified at the Institute, may one day serve as novel solid lubricants.

Iron-binding, tailor-made organic molecules have been shown to hold potential as minute computer switches.

The familiar photochromic materials that reversibly darken when exposed to sunlight are the result of a Weizmann Institute discovery many years ago. A new development may allow relatively heavy spectacle glass to be replaced by lightweight, plastic lenses with a self-tinting coating.



King and Queen by Canadian artist Sorel Etrog is one of many sculptures that adorn the Weizmann campus

Training for Research

The Weizmann Institute's Feinberg Graduate School produces graduates uniquely qualified for top research positions in academia, medicine and industry.

In fact, one-third of Israel's Ph.D.s in the natural sciences and mathematics received their training at the Feinberg Graduate School. The highly selective graduate school also hosts students from 25 countries, who constitute some 15% of the student body.

The School is distinguished by its dual Israeli-American accreditation, its challenging research-intensive program, and its policy of covering the tuition and living expenses of its students.

English is the language of instruction. One of the school's most noteworthy features is its hands-on approach with emphasis on immersion in current research and laboratory work.

Supporting Committees

Gifts made by generous friends from around the world provide the Weizmann Institute with a significant part of its annual operating budget, and nearly all of its development resources. Donor support is the lifeblood of the Institute's most innovative endeavours on the far frontiers of science.

A network of well-established international committees worldwide builds awareness of the Institute and involves individual donors in support of its scientific projects.

The Canadian Society for the Weizmann Institute of Science (Weizmann Canada) is a critical component of this network of support.

PRINCESS MARGARET HOSPITAL

As a member of the University Health Network and affiliated with the University of Toronto, Princess Margaret Hospital (PMH) has amassed an international reputation as a global leader in the fight against cancer. As one of the top comprehensive cancer treatment centres in the world, Princess Margaret Hospital and its research arm, the Ontario Cancer Institute, is also the only facility in Canada devoted exclusively to cancer research, treatment, education and compassionate patient care.

Established in 1952 by an Act of the Ontario Legislature, the Ontario Cancer Institute was officially opened by Her Royal Highness, Princess Margaret, on May 1, 1958. Named in her honour, the 87-bed facility was then located at 500 Sherbourne Street, Toronto.

It was on November 13, 1995, that Princess Margaret Hospital moved to its current location at 610 University Avenue, into the heart of Canada's greatest concentration of teaching and research hospitals.

HRH Princess Margaret was again on hand to officially reopen the hospital on July 12, 1996.

With the passing of the provincial Toronto Hospital Act on Jan 1, 1998, all oncology services at both Princess Margaret Hospital and Toronto General Hospital were merged as part of the province's health services restructuring initiative. In order to accommodate the new legislation, staff from both hospitals prepared to relocate all cancer services over to PMH. The first step involved renovating PMH to ensure that these services could be properly accommodated so that a seamless transition could take effect.

With the help of The Princess Margaret Hospital Foundation, a $15 million renovation program was completed in the fall of 1998, creating several new cancer treatment centres, within the hospital, for breast, prostate, head & neck, and brain tumours, as well as housing a world-class surgical oncology program.

The now 800,000 square-foot building accommodates 220 patient beds, 160,000 square-feet of research space, and 17 radiation treatment machines in special concrete bunkers below ground. With the large number of radiation treatment machines, PMH is the largest radiation treatment centre in Canada and one of the largest treatment facilities in the world. As such, PMH can serve 10,000 new patients a year and treats approximately 190,000 outpatients annually for diagnosis, treatment and follow-up.

Clinical and research staff at PMH represent many of the world's leading experts in oncology, with specialties including surgical oncology, bone marrow transplantation, chemotherapy, radiation oncology, psychosocial oncology, hematology, medical imaging and radiation therapy.

Princess Margaret Hospital's international reputation for excellence stems in part from its history of pioneering discovery. The Hemitron, a machine used to deliver full and half-body radiation, was designed and developed at PMH. The first research to determine that Hodgkin's Disease can be cured by radiation therapy was undertaken at PMH, boosting the disease's cure rate from 25% to 75%, and the world's first ultrasound device capable of producing images of the human eye at microscopic resolution was developed at PMH. The hospital's record of pioneering achievement continues today with the development of new innovative technologies and treatments for cancer, while expanding our scientific knowledge of fundamental biology of cancer cells for the next generation of treatments. PMH ranks among the top centers in the world for bone marrow transplantation, and has achieved a solid international reputation as having some of the longest surviving bone marrow transplant recipients in the world. The hospital's bone marrow transplant unit, established in 1971, was the first in Canada to perform allogenic transplants -- transplants between unrelated donors.

Princess Margaret Hospital Statistics:

- 10,000 new patients/year (approximately)
- 3,550 admissions/year (approximately)
- 130 open beds
- 172,000 clinic visits/year
- 21,200 chemotherapy visits/year
- 122,000 Radiation Therapy fractions/year
- 8,200 Radiation Therapy courses/year
- 271 bone marrow transplants/year
- 1,500 operations/year

PMH Firsts

1951: Canada was the first country in the world to develop a radiation source stronger than the x-ray to treat cancer patients. Dr. Harold Johns, scientist at the Ontario Cancer Institute (OCI), pioneered the first radiation machine called the "Cobalt-60" used to irradiate tumors. Today, radiation is still a primary treatment for cancer.

1954: Dr. Vera Peters at OCI found that lumpectomy paired with radiation treatment was as effective in treating early stage breast cancer as was mastectomy, prompting the motivation for detecting breast cancer earlier to dominate women's health care.

1958: The Hemitron, a machine used for whole and half-body radiation, was designed and developed at PMH. The hospital's first clinical physics department pioneered the use of computers in radiation therapy planning and developed techniques that have influenced radiation therapy planning throughout the world.

1971: PMH ranks among the top centers in the world for bone marrow transplantation, and has achieved a solid international reputation as having some of the longest surviving bone marrow transplant recipients in the world. The hospital's bone marrow transplant unit, established in 1971, was the first in Canada to perform allogenic transplants -- transplants between related or unrelated donors, and currently performs about 80 allogenic transplants each year. Bone marrow transplants were made possible in large part because of the work of Dr. Ernest McCulloch and Dr. James Till, senior scientists at PMH. Their discovery of stem cells in bone marrow and the role these cells play in the production of blood has allowed the development of bone marrow transplantation as a method for treating cancer patients.

1984: World's first discovery of the T-cell receptor, widely described as the "Holy Grail" of immunology by Dr. Tak Mak at OCI.

1998: Research team led by Dr. Tak Mak publishes article in Cell, detailing the world's first discovery of the PTEN gene, whose mutations or changes are linked to several cancers including brain, ovarian, breast, prostate, thyroid and skin.

1999: PMH announces one of the world's first comprehensive educational CD Rom series for patients, families and physicians. The CDs feature various cancer sites and translate complex medical information into an easily understandable form for patients using interactive virtual reality, 3-D animation and video clips. This demonstrates PMH's commitment to educating and empowering patients.

2000: Doctors at PMH are first in Canada to use robotic laparascopic technology to perform a radical prostatectomy. The procedure, using a voice activated robotic arm, allows surgeons to remove a cancerous prostate without invasive surgery.

2002: Doctors at PMH are the first in the world to collaborate with the Weizmann Institute in Israel to begin Phase I/II clinical trials for photodynamic therapy of the prostate using TOOKAD, a photosensitive plant derivative developed by Weizmann scientists.

University Health Network's Oncology program is the largest of its kind in Canada. Based at Princess Margaret Hospital, our comprehensive program provides more patient visits and involves more cancer doctors and specialists than any other oncology centre in the country.

Oncology & Blood Disorders Care Areas

- Medical Oncology
- Surgical Oncology
- Radiation Therapy
- Psychosocial Oncology
- Blood Disorders

One Of The Top Comprehensive Cancer Care Centres In The World.

We recognize that coping with cancer is a difficult and sometimes confusing process for patients and families. To help simplify this process, UHN's Oncology Program offers comprehensive care from one main site, with most clinics and services available at our Princess Margaret Hospital location. Patients receive care from a team of surgeons, medical and radiation oncologists, nurses and allied health professionals, while an electronic patient chart records all information relevant to diagnosis and treatment in one place.

The four treatment elements (Medical, Surgical, Radiation and Psychosocial Oncology) may be combined in different ways to treat different "cancer sites":

- Central Nervous System
- Head and Neck
- Lung
- Skin and Sarcoma
- Breast
- Genitourinary (e.g. bladder, prostate)
- Gynaecology (e.g. ovary, cervix, uterus)
- Gastrointestinal (e.g. colon, liver, pancreas)
- Endocrine (e.g. thyroid, pituitary)
- Malignant Haematology (e.g. leukemia, myeloma)
- Lymphoma

PROSTATE CANCER: WHAT YOU NEED TO KNOW

A diagnosis of prostate cancer occurs in approximately 18,200 men in Canada per year – a statistic that makes it the most prevalent cancer occurring in men over the age of 50. Unfortunately, the cause of this disease is unknown - a major hurdle that requires further study to provide a better understanding and form a basis to develop novel treatments.

Unlike some other forms of the disease, prostate cancer can go undetected for years, with no symptoms or signs of any illness. This fact has made prostate cancer one of the more difficult cancers to detect and diagnose in men.

A diagnosis of prostate cancer can have a profound effect on not just the patient, but also on his entire family. The emotional and psychological strain of fighting this disease is often compounded with the physical exhaustion that most patients and their families feel during the course of treatment. Ensuring that there is a sufficient support system and providing emotional support for patients and their families during their diagnosis and treatment is just as important as the actual physical treatment of the disease.

Despite great strides to expand our current understanding of prostate cancer, the best hope to beat the disease remains a combination of prevention, early detection and prompt treatment. Maintaining a well-balanced diet, low in fat and high in fibre may reduce the risk of developing prostate cancer. Furthermore, practicing early detection involves being armed with excellent knowledge regarding prostate disease, recognizing the signs of prostate cancer and routinely seeing a physician.

Discussing the potential benefits and risks of early detection testing with their physicians should be done by all men over 40 years of age. If detected early, the majority of prostate cancer cases are curable.

Researchers around the world, including those of the Weizmann Institute and Princess Margaret Hospital's research arm, the Ontario Cancer Institute, continue to investigate the causes of prostate cancer, assess current treatment methods and develop new treatment protocols. They realize that the hope of one day finding a cure lies in creating a better understanding of the disease.

The Prostate Centre at Princess Margaret Hospital

"A belief in treating the whole individual, not just the disease," is the philosophy behind the Prostate Centre at Princess Margaret Hospital. A specialized centre dedicated to patients who are receiving treatment for prostate diseases, the Prostate Centre combines the elements of patient care, education and research into a comprehensive program that caters to both the medical and psychosocial needs of our patients.

As the largest multidisciplinary prostate clinic in Canada, the focus is on the elements of cancer prevention, cancer diagnosis and cancer treatment. A number of patient education programs are in place to inform at-risk individuals how to modify their lifestyles, and numerous state-of-the-art methods are employed to accurately diagnose prostate cancer. An up-to-date patient resource library, counseling services and volunteers from Man to Man - a prostate cancer support group - also provide for the psychosocial needs of our patients and their families.

A leader in research of prostatic disease, our specialists and researchers work closely to ensure that patients receive the best care possible. A significant focus of the Prostate Centre is on the development of new treatment methods. Currently, clinical researchers, including the Director of the Prostate Centre, Dr. John Trachtenberg, are conducting international and North American trials on a number of new treatments.

One such treatment is intensity modified radiation therapy or IMRT. This new technique allows therapists to deliver higher doses of tumour-killing radiation while sparing healthy surrounding tissue. This method avoids some side effects of radiation while increasing the chances of successful treatment.

Interstitial microwave thermal therapy is another treatment that can cure the disease in patients who fit particular criteria. Interstitial microwave thermal therapy applies microwave energy to the affected area. This minimally invasive procedure uses directed heat to destroy all the cancer cells in the prostate.

Another exciting development is occurring in photodynamic therapy using Tookad, a plant derivative. Photodynamic therapy is the use of drugs that can be activated by light to treat tumour cells. Tookad is a drug that tends to migrate and stay in denser tumour tissues. The drug is "turned on" by infrared light and the otherwise harmless substance, then attacks the cancer cells.

In addition, one treatment that is also showing significant promise is brachytherapy. Brachytherapy is the placement of radioactive seeds within the prostate that are able to deliver high-dose radiation to localized areas. Patients who have undergone this specialized protocol have often shown immediate progress.

Through the continued dedication of its supporters, researchers and clinical staff, the Prostate Centre at Princess Margaret Hospital has established itself as one of the centres at the forefront of medical innovation and compassionate patient care.

TOOKAD: THE DRUG THAT ALMOST WASN'T

Great science, like great art, often needs a visionary patron in order to come to fruition. Be it a Pope, king, duke or inspired philanthropist, patrons have been vital in order for many of the monumental achievements of humankind to have been painted, sculpted, erected or discovered.

Michelangelo had Pope Julius II; Christopher Columbus had Spanish monarchs Ferdinand and Isabella; and Weizmann scientists Professors Avigdor Scherz and Yoram Salomon had Murray Kofffler and Sharon Zuckerman.

Professor Avigdor Scherz and Doctor John Trachtenberg

Working in the Department of Plant Sciences at the Weizmann Institute of Science, Prof. Scherz was confronted with cancer in the very close family and became obsessed with finding the means to defeat it. Using, the plant-based elements which he knew so well from his studies of photosynthesis, he discovered, synthesized and modified bacteriochlorophylls into new entities that enable controlled destruction of abnormal tissues. Along with Prof. Yoram Salomon of the Department of Biological Regulation they turned these new molecular entities into spearheads in the fight against cancer.

When injected into the body, the new molecules, naturally migrate to the blood vessels supporting dense tumour tissues. They stay in the circulating blood for about an hour. Within this period of time, if activated by light (in the near infra-red domain), the otherwise harmless molecules attack the tumor blood vessels, cutting off the tumour's nutrients and oxygen supply.

On paper, and in the lab, the new drug seemed promising for breast and melanoma as well as other cancers where the tumours are either readily accessible to a fiberoptic light guide or are not so deep in the body's tissues that the light waves cannot sufficiently penetrate.

In reality, a great deal of additional research and development were still required before these novel drugs could be used in critical clinical trials, but funding for these was very tight. Further opportunities for a full pharmaceutical development might have to be abandoned.

This is where the role of the patron as enlightened philanthropist comes in.

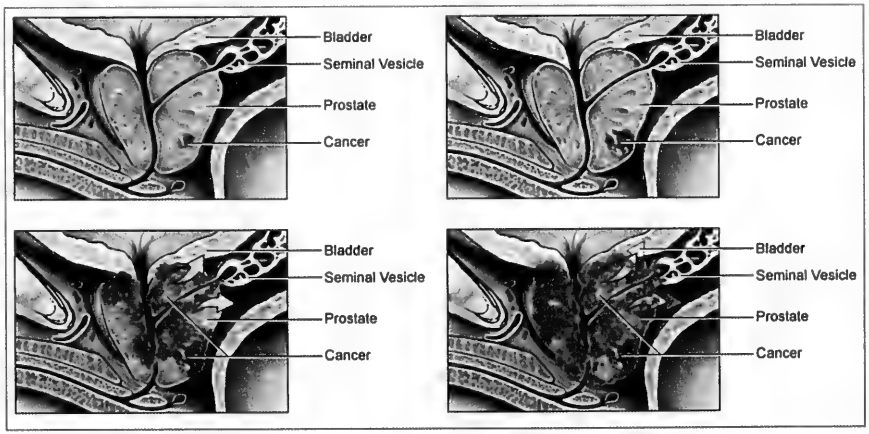
In 1996, Weizmann Canada President, Sharon Zuckerman, was leading a mission to the Weizmann Institute and met with Profs. Scherz and Salomon. She was extremely fascinated to learn of their research and dismayed that further research was imperiled due to funding constraints. Of particular interest was that the new bacteriochlorophyll compounds seemed most promising as a treatment of melanoma – generally referred to as skin cancer.

This struck a solemn chord with Sharon as her brother had died of the disease.

After consulting with Weizmann officials, Sharon decided to make a substantial donation in her brother's memory to be directed specifically to the continuation of the two scientists' work.

Research of the new drugs family continued to the point where industrial oriented research aimed at bringing it into pharmaceutically defined composites became imminent and, at this point, STEBA–BIOTECH a Netherlands based company in collaboration with Negma-Lerads, a French based pharmaceutical company, entered the picture. Motivated by the quest of the company owners to seek for cure to cancer, an intensive period of research and development on both the Weizmann and Company sides has started. Within two years, TOOKAD, a new and well-defined pharmaceutical composition was created from bacteriochlorophyll. Shortly after, it was ready to go into first clinical trials.

At this time, the Company and Weizmann teams discussed possible therapeutic avenues and sites that posses the know-how for such performance. The Canadian Institute for Biomedical Research headed by Prof. Brian Wilson where Avigdor Scherz had spent a short sabbatical and the Prostate Cancer Center at the Princess Margaret Hospital headed by Prof. John Trachtenberg, were definitely at the top of the list. On that point of time and development, Murray Koffler, founding President of Weizmann Canada and former Chair of the Institute's International Board of Governors introduced Prof. Scherz to Prof. John Trachtenberg. The Company teams for international drug development considered the advice of the three men of science and quickly saw the possibilities of using Tookad in vascular targeting photodynamic therapy of prostate cancer and set the two institutions – Weizmann and Princess Margaret – on a course culminating in the current Phase I/II clinical trials being conducted in Toronto and Montreal.



The spread of prostate cancer can be depicted in four stages

There is still much work to be done and many hurdles – often financial ones – to overcome, but Tookad and its currently "cooked" successors seem to be a charmed drug, destined to have its full potential discovered and used the world over.

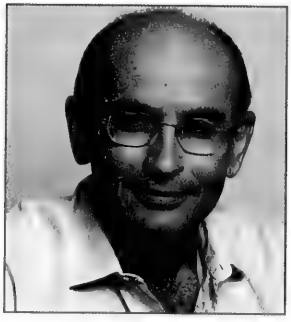
SIR ISAAC NEWTON

Like Newton, John Trachtenberg is the first to admit that his work with Tookad photodynamic therapy would not be possible without the pioneering efforts of colleagues at Princess Margaret Hospital and the Weizmann Institute. Professors Avigdor Scherz and Yoram Salomon of Weizmann and Dr. Brian Wilson at Princess Margaret, among many others, have been instrumental in bring the clinical trials to where they are today.

PROFESSOR AVIGDOR SCHERZ, PH.D.

Department of Plant Sciences
Weizmann Institute of Science



Receiving his Ph.D. in Physical Chemistry from the Hebrew University of Jerusalem, Prof. Scherz conducted his postdoctoral research at the Universities of Illinois at Urbana-Champaign and Washington in Seattle, where, introduced to primary reactions in photosynthesis, he developed a novel approach to clarifying and mimicking the way the photosynthetic apparatus tunes itself to prevailing light conditions. On his return to Israel, Prof. Scherz joined the Weizmann Institute.

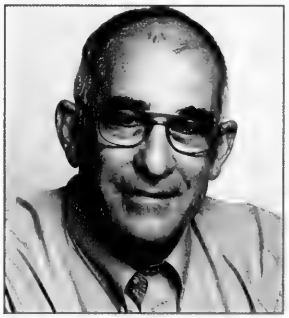
Prof. Scherz currently directs the Avron-Wilstatter Minerva Center for Research in Photosynthesis. In 1989, he received the Somech Sachs Memorial Award for his research into the optical spectroscopic qualities of photosynthetic pigments.

In addition to his work in photodynamic therapy, Prof. Scherz also studies structure-function relationships in proteins that control photosynthesis, and develops molecular "machines" based on photosynthetic pigments.

Prof. Scherz is the incumbent of the Yadelle and Robert N. Sklare Professorial Chair in Biochemistry.

Professor Yoram Salomon, Ph.D.

Department of Biological Regulation
Weizmann Institute of Science



Prof. Yoram Salomon received his Ph.D. in Biochemistry in 1972 from Hebrew University. He worked at the National Institutes of Health (Bethesda, Maryland) as a Postdoctoral Fellow, studying the molecular basis of hormonal signaling. He joined the Department of Hormone Research at the Weizmann Institute of Science in 1975, studying the biochemistry behind the hormonal regulation of female and male reproduction. In 1980, he was appointed Associate Professor and in 1990, Full Professor. From 1982-1986, he was Head of the Department of Biological Services. Other appointments have included Chairman of the Department of Hormone Research (1986-1992), Chairman of the Scientific Council of the Weizmann Institute (1995-1996) and Chairman of the Professorial Promotions Committee of the Life Sciences Faculties (1999-2002).

Ontario Cancer Institute — Princess Margaret Hospital

Brian Wilson was awarded his Ph.D. in high-energy nuclear physics from the University of Glasgow in Scotland. He then embarked on a distinguished career as an academic and clinical physicist at various institutions and hospitals.

Dr. Wilson arrived in Canada in 1981 and became Head of Medical Physics at the Ontario Cancer Treatment Foundation at the Hamilton Regional Cancer Centre. As Head of Research as well, Dr. Wilson was instrumental in developing and conducting significant research into the areas of biomedical physics. He is a Fellow of the American Society for Laser Medicine and Surgery, a member of the American Association of Physicists in Medicine and an executive member of the International Photodynamic Association. He currently sits on numerous advisory committees, which include both the National Institutes of Health in the U.S. and the Canadian Institutes of Health Research.

He also is an active participant in the education program at University of Toronto as a Professor of Medical Biophysics at the Faculty of Medicine, and continues to supervise doctorate and post-doctorate candidates in their research.

WEIZMANN CANADA

In 1964, philanthropist Ayala Zacks invited a small group of philanthropists to a reception to meet Toronto-born Meyer Weisgal, then President of the Weizmann Institute of Science. After exhorting the need for a Canadian Society of Weizmann, Weisgal appointed Murray Koffler its national president. "But you don't have a Canadian Society," said Koffler. "That's your problem now," was the response.

Always ready for a challenge, Murray Koffler set about to turn the problem into an opportunity. He did it so well that, years later, he was elected Chairman of the International Board of Governors of the Institute itself.

Weizmann Canada's mission is to mobilize support for the Institute's leading-edge research, to arrange exchange of scientists and scientific information between the Institute and Canadian scientific institutions, and to stimulate interest in scientific research. Today, the two landmark buildings at Weizmann are The Canadian Institute for the Energies and Applied Research, and The Canada Center of Nuclear Physics with its Koffler Accelerator Tower.

Founding members of Weizmann Canada were soon joined by a growing number of like-minded community leaders. They established chapters across Canada, raised funds for projects, scholarships and bursaries, fostered exchange visits among scientists and hosted numerous group visits to the Institute's campus in Rehovot, Israel. The first fundraising event in Canada was spearheaded by Henry Benson and Louis Bloomfield in Montreal to establish a Fellowship at the Weizmann Institute.

In 1988, Marvelle Koffler founded Weizmann Women and Science to mobilize support for research into women's and family's health concerns. Weizmann Women and Science has grown into a worldwide organization.

Since its founding, Weizmann Canada and its supporters have funded more than 50 individual projects, chairs and scholarships at the Weizmann Institute. The organization has been active in connecting Weizmann scientists with researchers in Canada and in promoting the work of the Institute to Canadians coast-to-coast.

The Princess Margaret Hospital Foundation

With a mission to "raise and steward the funds necessary for breakthrough research, compassionate care, and exemplary teaching at Princess Margaret Hospital, Canada's Cancer Centre," the Princess Margaret Hospital Foundation has built a solid tradition in facilitating philanthropy and community involvement.

Working together with healthcare and research professionals, patients, their families and the community, the Princess Margaret Hospital Foundation secures the financial resources necessary to enhance and support groundbreaking research, primary patient care and education initiatives at Princess Margaret Hospital.

As part of University Health Network, the Princess Margaret Hospital Foundation has recently partnered with its sister foundations, Toronto General & Western Hospital Foundation and the Arthritis & Autoimmunity Research Foundation, in a capital campaign to raise funds for medical research. With an overall goal of $400 million, the Princess Margaret Hospital Foundation has committed to fundraising its portion of $147 million that will go directly to cancer research, patient care and education.

The ultimate aim of the Foundation is to fulfill its vision: "To conquer cancer." Through annual giving campaigns, special events, stewardship and other programs, the Foundation raises more than $30 million annually to support critical and ongoing cancer research and treatment protocols at the hospital.

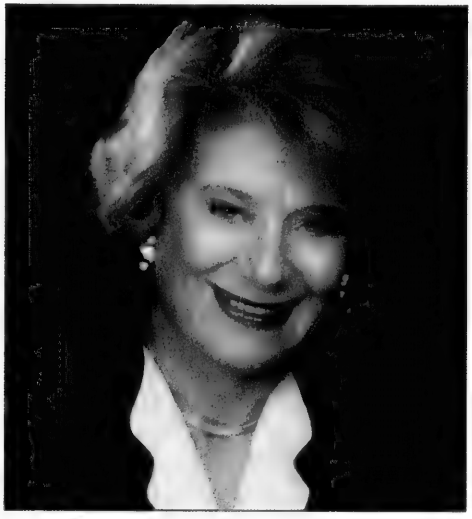
Mixing it up with Sharon Zuckerman

Past President, Weizmann Canada

Sharon Zuckerman is a woman who loves to mix it up!



Growing up in Toronto, Sharon Zuckerman feels she was very lucky to have been exposed to a broad mix of cultural and philanthropic influences. Her parents, Bertha and Joseph Kerbel had immigrated to Canada from, respectively, Russia and Poland at the ages of three and 17. Their sense of community and the value of helping others were instilled in Sharon from a very young age.

This influence continues to this day and helped establish Sharon as one of Toronto's many generous philanthropists.

More than just a "giver", Sharon is also a great "doer".

As a pre-teen, Sharon knew how fortunate she was to be able to spend summers at the family cottage at Lake Simcoe. It struck her as being unfair that inner-city youths did not have the same opportunity she had, to swim in clean water and breathe the fresh air of cottage country. She knew her sentiments were shared by others and saw The Toronto Star Fresh Air Fund as an excellent vehicle through which she could work to make a difference.

In a move that foreshadowed her future predilection to get involved, Sharon, from age 9 to 11, went door-to-door collecting items from neighbours at Lake Simcoe. Sharon then sold these at a bazaar held on the street each year. The following Monday, she would travel to Toronto with her father and give the money to The Toronto Star for the Fresh Air Fund. A picture would be published each year of Sharon handing over the funds she raised.

"The recognition was fun, especially for a young girl," recalls Sharon, "but it was knowing that I helped in some way and got others involved that kept me going."

From the ages of ten to twelve, Sharon also organized community plays with friends and contributed the admission receipts to the Fresh Air Fund.

Obviously this was a young lady with the determination to make things happen.

She was also determined to learn what she could from other people, cultures and religions. As she puts it, "to mix communities."

Attending boarding school, Sharon was compelled to attend church each Sunday, but was given the option of choosing which one. The local United Church of Canada seemed to fit best with her outlook and Sharon attended dutifully during her high school years. Upon graduation, she was fully qualified to teach Sunday School in the United Church.

As a young adult, Sharon followed in her mother's footsteps by joining the National Council of Jewish Women in the early 1950s. In the decade she remained involved, she helped the organization diversify into other activities, such as art instruction, and was there when they established the Meals on Wheels program.

For two decades, starting in the early 1970s, Sharon became a volunteer at the Royal Ontario Museum on both the committee level and as a docent. "I was fascinated with the Museum's ancient Chinese exhibits and took the museum course for docents," says Sharon. "I was drawn to ancient Chinese artifacts and history as the Royal Ontario Museum has the finest Chinese galleries in the world, outside of China itself. I also studied and toured the Egyptian and Islamic galleries."

"The recognition was fun, especially for a young girl," recalls Sharon, "but it was knowing that I helped in some way and got others involved that kept me going."

Prior to her involvement with the Museum, Sharon was introduced to The Canadian Society for the Weizmann Institute of Science (Weizmann Canada) by the Society's then president, Murray Koffler. The world of science, research and education was a natural draw to Sharon's inquisitive mind and she quickly became a very active member. This started what she terms as a "love affair" with the Weizmann Institute.

At that time, and continuing to this day, the Weizmann Institute has a five-week summer science program that attracts the best and brightest students from around the world – accepting only 75 each year. Canada had not joined this group. Sharon seized upon this as her main priority and organized a group of Canadian students to attend as the country's first delegation to the program. Unfortunately, word came back that the students, as bright as they were, were just not up to the same level as those from other countries. A more rigorous selection process was needed.

Undaunted, Sharon connected with the organizers of the Canada-Wide Science Fair to send their winning students to the Weizmann Institute. They certainly were bright enough, but not all of them had the financial means to travel and live in Israel for five weeks.

Sharon's response was to establish a foundation in her Father's name for this express purpose.

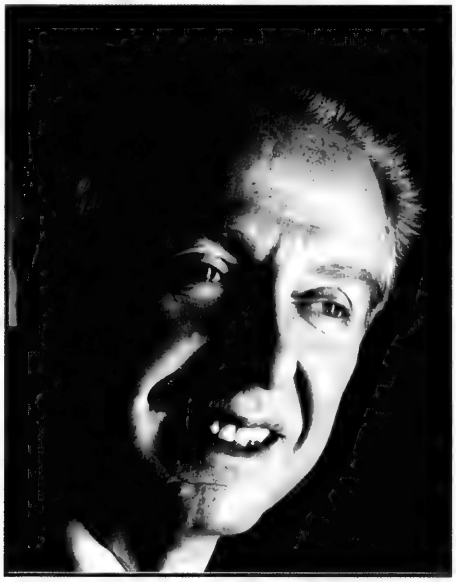
Today, the program is over-subscribed with hundreds of Canadian students having had the opportunity to be exposed to the Institute and its scientists thanks to Sharon's dedication.

Sharon's love affair with the Institute grew over the years. From 1995 to 2000 she served as President of Weizmann Canada. It was during this period that she had a fateful meeting with Prof. Avigdor Scherz at the Institute and learned of his work for melanoma. Sharon's brother had died of the disease and her determination to help was only fueled when she learned that the research could not continue without more financial support.

Sharon pledged the needed support and continued to bolster the work of Professors. Scherz and Yoram Salomon for two years until they were approached and funded by the French pharmaceutical company, Negma.

Sharon sits on the Weizmann Institute's International Board of Governors. She was a Co-Chair of this year's Brazilian Carnival Ball in benefit of the Critical Care Unit of the Mt. Sinai Hospital, headed by Dr. Tom Stuart. She continues to work with at least two organizations at once and delights in actively mixing communities.

Along with her husband George, Sharon has instilled her philosophy into the couple's four grown children. They have been brought up to respect other people's religion, to help those in the community that are less fortunate than they and to extend their help to Israel.



JOSEPH "JOEY" TANENBAUM,

C.M., K.M., D. Eng., B.A. Sc., P. Eng., FCSCE
Chairman & CEO, Jay-M Enterprises Ltd.

To understand what Joey Tanenbaum knows about business - and indeed, about how he lives his life – can only come from telling the story of his late and much beloved Grandfather (his "Zaida"), Abraham Tanenbaum.

Abraham Tanenbaum arrived in Toronto in August of 1911 with only eight dollars in his pocket. On board the ship from Hamburg to New York, he met two "landsmen" – two men from his own village of Parczew in Poland. When he asked them where they were going, they said, "To Toronto". Abraham inquired if Toronto was in America. When they replied positively, he said: "Then I will go with you."

The three travelers arrived at 2pm on a Friday afternoon, just before the Sabbath, at the southwest corner of St. Clair Avenue and Runnymede Road. This place was called "The Junction" because it was where all the rail traffic to Toronto from the east, west and the north joined together.

Choosing to stay and observe the Sabbath, Abraham started to search for a Jewish home with a mezuzah. Then, he thought he would proceed on Sunday to the Spadina and College Street area, where the small Jewish community was known to exist.

In 1911, the total Jewish population of the City of Toronto was 2,000 people. It was amongst this small community that Abraham found an enclave of immigrant Jews who were living and thriving. He became so enchanted with the place that he didn't just spend the weekend – he decided to settle down on Maria Street and made his home there for the next 40 years.

Abraham Tanenbaum started out as a peddler with a pushcart. After three years, he had saved enough money to bring his wife (Joey's grandmother) and their two children, 8-year-old Joe and 5-year-old Max, to Canada. The family arrived on August 3, 1914 – the very same day that the British Empire declared war on Germany and the First World War began for Canada.

By 1917, Abraham was able to buy his first horse and wagon. Needing a piece of land to store all of his equipment and material, he was able to purchase the northwest corner of Runnymede and Dundas Street for $200 in cash and an $1,800 first mortgage at 3 per cent. Within a period of 4 years, a real estate agent came to purchase a 60 by 60 foot corner of the land. Abraham sold that piece of land for $16,000 cash to the Toronto Railway Commission, which today is the TTC. But The Mail, the predecessor of The Globe and Mail, reported in error that Abraham had sold the corner – the most westerly turning point for Toronto's streetcars at the time – for the princely sum of $96,000!

With this sudden new "fame", the banks approached Abraham with the offer of "anything you want, you can have." Abraham's reply was: "I'll give you $16,000 now and the other $80,000 at a later date, provided that you are good to me." In August of 1942, Abraham, with tongue-in-cheek, informed young Joey that the bank was still waiting for the other $80,000!

That "year of the horse", marked the beginning of Runnymede Metal & Salvage Company, which eventually grew to become the Runnymede Iron & Steel Company.

What Abraham taught his sons about business, he handed down to young Joey as well. Imparting his wisdom and principles, Abraham Tanenbaum gave Joey a philosophy of life.

Every Sabbath after lunch, Joey would sit with his Zaida to "vertatch a blatt gemarah," that is, "to study a portion of the Talmud." It was during these warm and meaningful discussions in Yiddish that Joey came to understand the importance for every individual never to forget from whence he came. Zaida taught Joey "to never make money your god; there is only one God and that is the God in heaven."

Zaida also told Joey that he must make business his science. He told him to "never get involved in a business you know nothing about." Young Joey would ask his Zaida, "How did you become so wealthy?" And Abraham's answer would be: "My son, I would buy for a dollar and sell for two dollars, and make one percent!" Joey was perplexed and informed his grandfather, "But Zaida, that is not one percent. That is 100 percent." Abraham looked at Joey in all seriousness and said, "My son, I made it. It's one percent."

This is the basic lesson in business that Joey Tanenbaum still adheres to today - to continue to make his one percent.

Joey Tanenbaum went on to graduate from the University of Toronto in Applied Science in 1955 - a critical time when an air of anti-Semitism existed within that notorious university department. He persevered, figuratively wearing the banner of his Jewishness with dignity and pride, while gaining the critical engineering skills that would assist him in his family's successful business pursuits.

Indeed, both Joey's grandparents have helped him understand, take pride in and honour his Jewish heritage. By their words, and by their living example, they taught Joey to love and to honour his faith, which holds for him his basic philosophy for life.

Known in wide and varied circles for his monumental philanthropy, Joey Tanenbaum is a well-known patron of the arts, higher education, religious causes and medical research in the community. He believes that Canadians live in the best country in the world and with that privilege comes a responsibility to set an example: the example of true Tzedakah. This Hebrew word literally translated means, not "charity", but "obligation"; that is, it is the obligation of every Canadian citizen who is financially successful, to share with others who are not as fortunate.

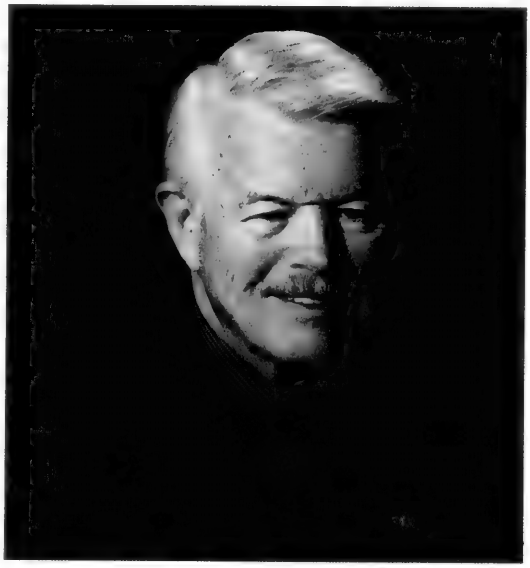
This is the example that Joey, and his wife Toby, have lived by and instilled within their own children, Michael, Alan, Marty, Rob and Susan, who have gone on to be very successful in their own lives.

Joey Tanenbaum has made a significant contribution to the long and generous legacy of philanthropy in our community. One of his many contributions has been to the Fleck/Tanenbaum Chair in Prostatic Disease at Princess Margaret Hospital, held by Dr. John Trachtenberg.

A survivor of prostate cancer himself, Joey Tanenbaum persevered over his condition with the same determination, humour and strength that he demonstrates in his everyday life. Through his relationship with Dr. John Trachtenberg, he recognized the importance of research into the causes of prostatic disease. His generous support of this Chair will pave the way for a better understanding of the causes of prostate cancer, in the hopes of providing new treatment methods.

Through his generosity, unfailing adherence to his family, the lessons of his "Zaida", and his unwavering commitment to his Jewish faith, Joey Tanenbaum continues to live his life through example and continues to inspire others to do the same.

JAMES D. FLECK, O.C.



James D. Fleck has carved a distinguished career. From his undergraduate days at the University of Western Ontario, where he graduated as a gold medallist, James Fleck began an eminent journey that saw him become a businessman, a civil servant, a professor, an author and a philanthropist.

Immediately after his triumph in his undergraduate education, James, or "Jim", became active in the business world. While most would casually secure themselves an entry-level position and assume a place on the corporate business ladder, Jim founded Fleck Manufacturing Incorporated and became its president from 1953 to 1960. During that time he was also was active in the Young Presidents' Organization and even became its International President for a term from 1972 to 1973.

Academia, however, was never far from his mind. Jim decided to enroll in graduate studies and was awarded a doctorate of business administration by Harvard in 1964, as a Ford Foundation Fellow. And then, from 1964 to 1966, Jim Fleck found himself in front of numerous classrooms of eager students. As a faculty member of the Harvard Business School in Cambridge, Jim taught fresh-faced MBA first-years in their prerequisite finance courses.

Caught with the "teaching bug", Jim Fleck has also taught, on a visiting basis, at the Keio Business School in Tokyo (Japan), at The European Institute of Business Administration in Fontainebleau (France), and at the University of Western Ontario. In addition to those initial finance courses, he has imparted his knowledge on business policy and government relations to students around the world

Returning to Toronto in 1966, Jim left his indelible mark on the Canadian business administration academic landscape by joining York University and helping to found the Faculty of Administrative Studies. He then became the Associate Dean of the Faculty and Director of both the MBA and MPA Programmes.

Now a distinguished academic and sought-after advisor, Jim became Executive Director and a member of the Committee on Government Productivity, which was responsible for carrying out a study that led to a major reorganization of the Ontario Government. Prior to that, he had also served on the Federal Department of Transport Task Force on their goals and objectives.

Intrigued by the world of government and the positive impact that his expertise could have on the province, Jim entered civil service. In 1972, he became Chief Executive Officer for the Office of the Premier, Government of Ontario. From 1974 to 1975, Jim was the Secretary of the Cabinet. The pinnacle of his civil service career came in January of 1976, when he became Deputy Minister of Industry and Tourism for the Government of Ontario.

In and amidst his numerous business and academic activities, Jim Fleck still finds time to engage in volunteerism and philanthropy, promoting causes in the arts, sports and medical research.

In addition to these full-time appointments, Jim was, at various times, appointed Coordinator for Ontario's Anti-Inflation Program, a member of the Special Program Review to suggest ways to reduce government expenditures, a member of the Ontario Committee on Inflation Accounting and Ontario's Coordinator for the Multilateral Trade Negotiations.

An invitation to assume the position of the William Lyon Mackenzie King Visiting Professor of Canadian Studies, Business and Public Management at the John F. Kennedy School of Government at Harvard University persuaded him to leave the civil service in 1978.

Returning again to Canada after his academic sojourn, Jim Fleck picked up right where he left off, turning again to business as Chairman of Fleck Manufacturing Inc., a manufacturer of wire and cable, power cords and wiring assemblies for the appliance, automotive and electronic industries, until it was acquired by Noma Industries Limited in 1994. He was also Chairman of Alias Research Inc., a 3D computer graphics software company, until it too was acquired in 1995. And Jim was also a Director at other various companies such as CUC Ltd., a large private cable television company acquired by Shaw Cable in 1995 and Promis Systems Corporation Limited that was successfully acquired by PRI Automation in 2000.

Currently, Jim Fleck is Chairman of Fleck Management Services Ltd., an investment advisory company and International Waterpillow Inc. He is also a Director of ATI Technologies Inc., Financial Models Company Inc., IE-Engine Inc., Rogers Multimedia Inc., tlContact inc., and Certicom Corp.

Jim is also the emeritus M. Wallace McCutcheon Professor of Business Government Relations at the Faculty of Management, University of Toronto and a Senior Fellow, Massey College. As an author, his publications include: Business Can Succeed! Understanding the Political Environment (with A. Litvak, Canada Publishing Corporation), Canada Can Compete! Strategic Management of the Canadian Industrial Portfolio (with J. R. D'Cruz, Institute for Research on Public Policy), and the Toche Ross Award winning article: Yankee Canadians in the Global Economy, Strategic Management of U.S. Subsidiaries under Free Trade (with J.R. D'Cruz, National Centre for Management Research and Development, University of Western Ontario). In addition, he has co-authored, with Professor J.R. D'Cruz, several articles for the Business Quarterly, including "The Globalization of Manufacturing" which received the Silver Medal in the Deloitte & Touche "Best of the Best" Awards covering the first 30 years of the Business Quarterly.

In and amidst his numerous business and academic activities, Jim Fleck still finds time to engage in volunteerism and philanthropy, promoting causes in the arts, sports and medical research. A Chairman for the Art Gallery of Ontario, the Harbourfront Foundation and past Chairman for Tennis Canada, Jim continues to be active in the community. He is also a Director of the Canadian Institute of Advanced Research and founding President of The Power Plant, Contemporary Art at Harbourfront, Toronto. He also led the private side of a public-private collaboration with the City of Toronto to create and build the Yo-Yo Ma Toronto Music Garden, inspired by the music of Bach.

But Jim's most recent philanthropic legacy is the Fleck/Tanenbaum Chair in Prostatic Diseases held by Dr. John Trachtenberg. His tradition of philanthropy and his genuine concern for the cause inspired him to support the superb research being conducted by Dr. Trachtenberg. He realized the magnitude of potential impact that this important research will have on thousands of men, and their families, who are suffering with cancer.

Jim Fleck is a pioneer and a visionary. His numerous contributions to the business world, to government, to academia and to his community will have lasting effects on the people and world around him. He is a true example of a full life that continues to be well lived.

Community institutions face latest SARS outbreak

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

The Jewish community is coping as well as it can with inconvenience and danger from the latest outbreak of SARS.

In one recent case, an elderly woman who died at North York General Hospital, the epicentre of the current outbreak, was cared for by Steeles College Memorial Chapel and buried May 20 at Hebrew Memorial Park, Pardes Sholom in Maple.

It was only several days later that the Toronto Board of Health informed its counterpart in York Region that the woman had been a probable SARS case. As a result, two funeral directors and another staff person at Steeles, two staff at Pardes Sholom and the people who attended the funeral had to go into quarantine, Steeles executive director Carol Saucier told The CJN.

Fortunately, Saucier said, the members of the chevrah kadishah who prepared the body for burial followed standard procedures and used universal health precautions, including masks, gloves, gowns, and goggles to protect themselves from any infectious disease.

None of the staff at Steeles or Pardes Sholom developed symptoms, and they were all released from quarantine late last week.

Stephen Speisman, executive director of Pardes Sholom, said cemetery staff use masks and gloves when they are notified that a body is a suspected or probable case of SARS.

"There is very little danger when dealing with the casket [and a body]," he said. "The danger comes from contact with the family and friends attending the funeral."

A SARS patient, a close relative of the person who was buried May 20, was scheduled to be buried June 3 at Pardes Shalom and "staff [took] every precaution," Speisman said.

ISRAEL

Children Shell Shocked

TEL AVIV — Almost half of Israeli children suffer from shell shock due to terror attacks, says a new study by the Adler Centre at Tel Aviv University and the Judea and Samaria College in Ariel. Symptoms include flashbacks, nightmares and panic attacks. As well, one-fifth have a relative who was a terror victim and more than 300 lost a loved one in an attack. The report is based on a poll of 3,000 children taken right after the wave of attacks around the 2002 Passover holiday.

Whitney Meets PM

JERUSALEM — U.S. pop singer Whitney Houston met last week with Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon and told him her relationship with Israel "is a friendship I've never had with any other country." Houston and her family were in Israel for a week as guests of the Black Hebrews, a group of black Americans in Dimona who say they're descendants of the lost tribes of Israel.

Citizenship Change

JERUSALEM — Attorney General Elyakim Rubinstein and Prime Minister Ariel Sharon are backing a proposed amendment to Israel's Citizenship Law that would prevent children with one Jewish parent and one Palestinian parent from receiving automatic citizenship. Leftist politicians and human rights groups criticized the proposal, which comes in response to a suicide bombing last year in Haifa by a man with a Jewish mother and a Palestinian father. His citizenship made it easier for him to move freely in Israel and carry out the bombing.

WORLD

Belgian Court Boycott

BRUSSELS — Israel said it plans to boycott future proceedings of a lawsuit filed in Belgium against a senior Israeli official for alleged war crimes. A Belgian court is set to rule next month in a lawsuit filed against Gen. Amos Yaron for alleged war crimes in a 1982 massacre of Palestinians in the Sabra and Shatila refugee camps by a Lebanese militia. Israel says Belgium's universal jurisdiction law is heavily politicized. Belgium recently amended it so that suits against defendants who come from democratic countries where they could receive a fair trial could be returned to those countries. Using that argument, a lawsuit against former U.S. president George Bush and other U.S. officials over the 1991 Gulf War was sent to U.S. courts, but the suit against Yaron is still proceeding, which Israeli officials say is discriminatory. Yaron, who in 1982 commanded Israeli forces in Beirut, is now director general of Israel's Defence Ministry.

Best Actor Award

NEW YORK — Ohad Knoller of the Israeli film Yossi and Jagger won the best actor award at the second annual Tribeca Film Festival in New York City last month. Yossi and Jagger, directed by Eitan Fox, tells the story of two gay lovers serving in the Israeli army. The film also won the Gay Cinema Prize at the Turin Film Festival in Italy and received critical and public acclaim in Israel.

Djerba Pilgrimage

DJERBA, Tunisia — More than 1,000 Jewish pilgrims, including 450 foreigners, travelled last month to the site of an Al Qaeda-linked attack last year that killed 21 people at the Ghriba Synagogue, Africa's oldest, on the Tunisian island of Djerba. Last year's event, which took place two weeks after a suicide bomber blew up a fuel tanker outside the shul, attracted only about 200 Jews.

Complaint Dismissed

LONDON — Britain's press watchdog has dismissed a complaint that a Jan. 27 cartoon showing Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon eating a baby was anti-Semitic. The Press Complaints Commission accepted the contention by the Independent newspaper that the cartoon was based on the Goya painting Saturn Devouring One of His Children and rejected the Israeli embassy position the cartoon referred to a blood libel against Jews.

Shul Leaves Orthodoxy, Adopts Mixed Seating

OTTAWA — As of the first Shabbat after Shavuot, the Beth Shalom Synagogue in downtown Ottawa will allow women and men to sit together and for women to read haftorot, two things that have up to now been forbidden at the shul.

The controversial move comes after 70 per cent of Beth Shalom's members voted April 30 to leave the Orthodox movement and affiliate the synagogue with the Union for Traditional Judaism, a group that is positioned theologically between the Conservative and Orthodox movements.

Synagogue president Jack Shapiro said he hopes the switch will help Beth Shalom attract young families and a more diverse congregation, as regular attendance is well below capacity and most members are over 50.

Ian Sandinsky, the president of Beth Shalom from 1996 to 2000, said the new rules will mean traditional Orthodox Jews like him can't daven there. "I joined an Orthodox shul. I want it to remain an Orthodox shul," he said.

Shapiro said the shul will set aside a separate area for men and women who don't want to sit together. He added that women will still not be allowed to have aliyot, and wedding and burial practices won't change.

Community institutions face latest SARS outbreak

When cemetery officials were notified May 25 that Pardes Shalom had handled a probable SARS case, the assembly room where the funeral service was held was cleaned with industrial cleaners a second time.

SARS forces postponement of wedding

see page 27

"Hebrew Memorial Park took the situation very seriously from the beginning [of the first SARS outbreak]," said cemetery president William Draimin.

"We institute precaufions as soon as we are aware that there might be a potential problem. These precautions were never relaxed, even when the community was supposedly SARS-free."

Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care was also touched by SARS when a man was transferred to its hospital May 22 from North York General for rehabilitation. He was well when he arrived, but the next night he developed a temperature and was moved the next day to Humber River Regional Hospital.

As a precaution, the western half of Baycrest's hospital third floor was closed to all but essential staff, and patients there were being monitored regularly. The ward was to reopen June 3, the centre's Web site said.

The rest of Baycrest stayed open as usual for visitors and private companions, and all regular services operated normally.

Access to the main complex is still being limited to one entrance on its western side, where all visitors are screened and no one who has visited facilities involved in the latest SARS outbreak is allowed in.

St. John's Rehabilitation Hospital is another health-care facility that has had to deal with SARS patients. Spokesperson Holly Bannerman said "patients come here to recover. Anyone with any symptoms [of any disease] is immediately transferred to an acute care hospital." As of Monday, no patients were being transferred in or out.

However, because someone with SARS was at the facility for a short time, St. John's is now closed to patient transfers and visitors, and staff are all on "working quarantine," Bannerman said.

"That means that they can come to work and then go home, and that's it. If they don't have their own car, we provide taxi service."

All staff must have their temperature taken before entering and leaving. They are also encouraged to wash their hands frequently and must wear goggles, masks and gowns when interacting with patients. Patients have their temperature taken every two hours, Bannerman said.

Except during therapy, which is now done on an individual, not a group basis, patients must stay in their rooms. They can be discharged if they have no symptoms, but they must go into home quarantine for 10 days, she added.

Much the same situation applies at North York General. Its Branson and Leslie divisions, as well as its seniors facility, have suspended all visits, transfers, admissions and discharges, and staff are also on working quarantine.

Hospital spokesperson Kara Miel said every effort is being made to comfort patients, including arranging for e-mail, television and newspapers, and providing frequent updates about what is going on.

Women who are scheduled to give birth at North York General are being sent to other facilities, Miel said.

Several other hospitals are also treating SARS patients, but since they have not been exposed to the general hospital population, they are not considered a threat to the health of others. However, all hospitals, including York Central and Mount Sinai, are screening visitors and staff upon entry.

Seymour Epstein, executive director of UJA Federation Board of Jewish Education, said that while the BJE sends out board of health protocols to all the day and supplementary schools under its aegis, each school decides how to implement them.

He said he believes schools are emphasizing strict standards of hygiene, especially hand-washing.

The conferral of goodness

From the editor's desk

The possible manifestations for implementing the rabbinic injunction of hakarat hatov, acknowledging the good someone has done for you – a concept about which I have written before in this space – are, of course, limitless. Perhaps the most elegant is simply uttering the phrase "thank you."

An expression of thanks by an individual, conveyed deeply, sincerely, from the heart, will almost certainly find its way to another heart. For that is the natural path of openly expressed honesties.

But institutions too are obliged to say thank you. After all, are not the large-scale benefits they bestow upon the public, merely the cumulation of countless individual acts of goodness conferred upon them?

Last month in Israel, I witnessed an especially memorable and moving manifestation of hakarat hatov performed by Tel Aviv University. It was the time of year, as it is for all western universities, when it said thank you to a select group of individuals by conferring upon them the degree of Doctor Philosophiae Honoris Causa, (an honorary doctorate.)

Fourteen individuals from around the world were selected by the university to receive honorary doctorates. Among them were:

- Edgar Bronfman, "in recognition of his unparallelled standing and influence in the international community as spokesman for Diaspora Jewry;"
- Steven Pinker for, among other reasons, "his pioneering of new insights into the functioning of the mind for the benefit of humanity;"
- Michael Walzer for, among other reasons, "his exceptional achievement in shaping the field of contemporary political philosophy."

The Israeli media paid particular attention to the university's conferral of an honorary doctorate on the Iraqi Muslim Kanan Makiya for "his remarkable life-work as a scholar, thinker, writer, filmmaker and activist devoted to exposing the brutality and oppression of the Iraqi Ba'ath."

I was at the Saturday night ceremony, along with a large contingent from Toronto and Israel, to see our longtime friend Marty Goldberg also receive an honorary doctorate from the university. It was a thrilling and touching moment. Even hardened cynics agreed that the honour bestowed upon him by the university held special merit.

I once heard it said about Marty –and I have no reason to doubt the truth of the statement – that there are as many stars in the sky as there are individual acts of kindness, generosity and goodness that Marty has conferred upon others.

The extent to which he gives of himself to people and to causes is legendary in his home community and abroad. And the manner in which he gives is legendary too: in secret.

Marty on stage

Impassioned and always well-intended, his giving is usually accomplished in the following pattern. Without being asked, he arranged for the delivery of a parochet (a covering for the Holy Ark) to a shul after he noticed that it did not have an adequate one. Most of the congregants, to this day, do not know how their synagogue received its new parochet.

He is as big-hearted as he is broad-shouldered. No burden is too little; nor is any too great for him to carry.

One of the causes Marty has championed for more than a decade, has been that of Tel Aviv University. And the university last month acknowledged this.

Thus, he was awarded an honorary doctorate degree by the university "in recognition of his position as an esteemed figure in the Toronto Jewish community... and in special recognition of his warm and devoted friendship toward Tel Aviv University, his exceptional contributions to the success of the Toronto Friends association as its president and driving force for many years, his generosity in supporting Friends' activities and boundless energy in promoting the association's status in Canada, his inspired initiative in fostering co-operative ties between Tel Aviv University and institutions in Canada."

Moments after Marty and the other honorees received their degrees, the late Col. Ilan Ramon's wife and father – Rona Ramon and Eliezer Wolferman – were called to the stage to accept for the fallen astronaut an award that was designated for him before his death, the George W. Wise Medal for International Academic Co-operation. The moment was electric with emotion.

Father and daughter-in-law stood side by side, tightly clasping each other's hand. The audience rose in long, sustained applause and thunderous ovation.

We felt a strange mixture of sadness and triumph as we watched Ramon's kin bear up under the rising canopy of overt, bittersweet affection. No one saw as tears streaked our cheeks. From my vantage, however, far from the stage, I happened to notice that Marty was crying too, a final acknowledgement perhaps from him, from us all, of the good that Ramon had conferred on us. Seeing Marty that way seared the moment much deeper into my memory.

Marty's friends are planning to further celebrate his achievement on Aug.13.

Ontario bill sets out to enshrine tax credit in law

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

The provincial government last week introduced legislation aimed at formally unfreezing the private school tax credit and extending it through its originally intended schedule.

Community observers say Bill 53, which passed first reading by a vote of 45 to 38, entrenches the credit in law. But they say that will likely do little to sway Liberal leader Dalton McGuinty, who has promised to repeal the credit should he become premier.

If passed, the bill will place the Equity in Education Tax Credit (ETC) back on its original schedule, right through to 2006.

When introduced in late 2001 by then-finance minister Jim Flaherty, the measure entitled parents of children in private and faith-based schools to a tax credit of up to $700 per child, or 10 per cent of the first $7,000 of tuition fees. To be phased in over the next five years, the credit was to rise 10 per cent per year, and by 2006, be worth up to $3,500 per child annually.

But a year ago, Premier Ernie Eves announced the province could not afford that, and he froze the credit at 10 per cent for two years.

However, in March, Eves reversed the freeze, meaning the ETC, as intended, will be worth 20 per cent, or $1,400 of the first $7,000 in tuition fees, for this year.

Bill 53 aims to formalize that in legislation, and to fully implement the credit's rise through to its maturity.

"It is legislation that supports parents' educational choices," finance minister Janet Ecker told the Legislature.

"This credit will assist those parents who choose an education for their child that may better reflect their religious or cultural heritage, or that may respond better to their child's special needs," she said.

Ecker said parents of children at more than 580 of the province's 733 private schools are eligible to claim the credit. But these schools must do a criminal check of employees and disclose the contents of their curricula.

Critics say the credit will drain up to $500 million a year from the public and separate school systems.

In the Jewish community, parents of students at Associated Hebrew Day Schools are grousing that a 14 per cent increase in tuition beginning in September all but nullifies the benefits of the ETC.

McGuinty "could freeze the credit at 20 per cent" instead of repealing it outright, said Simon Rosenblum of Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region. "But I don't think he can just let it go at that.

"The tax credit is at risk. That wouldn't be an overstatement," Rosenblum said.

The bill unfreezing the credit "will make no difference, unfortunately," said Yisroel Janowski, founding president of the Ontario Association of Jewish Day Schools. "I wish Liberals will take into account they will be hurting a significant number of children."

Asked if he thinks whether Bill 53 would change McGuinty's steadfast commitment to dump the ETC, Janowski said, "I just have to believe him."

Janowski also expressed disappointment that Liberal MPPs Monte Kwinter and Michael Bryant voted against Bill 53.

"They can no longer tell the Jewish community they're in favour of the ETC."

Synagogue membership case reaches settlement

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

A settlement was reached last Tuesday in the trial regarding a membership dispute at the Lodzer Centre Holocaust Congregation.

Longtime synagogue member Barbara Rotberg and her husband of three years, Allen Mayer, had sued the congregation and three board members for $20,000 in damages for alleged loss of social standing as well as for membership for Mayer and the right for him to be buried in one of the plots held by his wife.

As part of the settlement, the synagogue agreed to admit Mayer as a member, the defendants' lawyer Arnold Zweig told The CJN. Mayer was already entitled to a burial plot, according to the statement of defence. All other claims were dismissed.

The previous day, Rotberg's claim for loss of reputation and social standing was dismissed by Judge Abraham Mandel of the Ontario Superior Court of Justice, civil division.

An earlier attempt to reach a settlement during the trial was not successful.

Zweig said that from his point of view, settling was the "right thing to do. The parties have to live together [because Rotberg is a member], regardless of what happens." He stressed that the settlement does not constitute an admission of wrongdoing.

Jeffrey Silver, the lawyer for Mayer and Rotberg, said he was pleased with the decision.

Concerning our federal leaders

A number of news items concerning federal politicians caught our attention last week. Leaders were travelling, opining and getting elected. What they said and what they did were not without significant implications for the Canadian electorate.

Jean Chrétien: Perhaps it was because he is the senior head of government of the G-8 member states and he knew it was to be his last G-8 meeting. Perhaps he wanted to show his G-8 colleagues one last proof of his fearless Canadian independence. Perhaps it was because he was simply feeling vindictive. Or perhaps it was a combination of all of these reasons that Prime Minister Chrétien, in the airplane on the way to the G-8 summit, publicly and of his own initiative, decided to belittle George W. Bush, one of the more "junior" leaders in the G-8 panoply.

Whatever the prime minister's motivation, his unprovoked criticism of the American president was wholly inappropriate.

Set aside the fact that his diatribe likely harmed Canadian interests by complicating a speedier resolution of important bilateral trade, security and other issues between the two countries. The key offence of the prime minister's remarks lay in the fact that they demonstrated a manifest lack of respect for the president as an individual and for his office. Despite the prime minister's subsequent efforts to justify his actions, his boastful belittlement of Bush painted more of a self-portrait than it did one of the president of the United States. And what Canadians saw was the unflattering image of a spiteful individual trying to raise his own stature by standing upon the ephemeral heap of unsolicited, petty observations about his "friend," George Bush.

Jack Layton: In an interview that appeared in The CJN, the leader of the NDP said, "I think I'm feeling a warming beginning to happen" [with Jewish Canadian voters]. Layton is wishfully rather than realistically thinking.

There is no discernible evidence of such "warming." Nor will there be unless and until he repudiates the outrageous calumnies spread against Israel by some of his caucus colleagues. In many parts of the world, anti-Israel rhetoric of the left has transmogrified into brazen, ugly anti-Semitism. The vast majority of Jewish Canadian voters will spurn his party, despite historic and other ties to it and to some traditionally labour-oriented policies, as long as NDP foreign policy fails to demonstrate even perfunctory, let alone meaningful, understanding of Israel's plight.

Peter Mackay: The CJN congratulates the new leader of the Progressive Conservative party. Parliament is strengthened and the Canadian people are better served when all the parties are vigorous and better able to responsibly and reasonably challenge the government of the day. We therefore wish him well as he attempts to bring greater vigour to Canada's oldest federal political party.

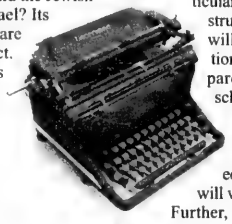
To Jack Layton: Thanks but no thanks

Re "NDP leader seeks Jewish vote" (CJN, May 29), I could not believe my eyes. A puff piece in the Canadian Jewish News for the NDP. I realize Jack Layton is a politician and therefore will say and do anything to get elected, but this is ridiculous. Why in the world would the Jewish community support a party that is anti-Israel? Its union leaders bosses (particularly CUPE) are anti-Israel and pass resolutions to that effect.



The only party that consistently supports Israel and the Jewish people is the Canadian Alliance.

Time to tell Jack thanks, but no thanks.

Jack won't get my vote

Re "NDP leader seeks Jewish vote" (CJN, May 29), all thinking people understand exactly where Jack Layton and the NDP party stand. Accordingly, I would like to advise Layton not to hold his breath while waiting for my vote. He will black out before he gets it.

Associated responds to fee increase

The sacrifices made by many Jewish parents to provide their children with a Jewish day school education are apparent to all of us. Associated Hebrew Schools continually tries its best to keep tuition fees as low as possible and to accommodate families in financial need. Our school strongly believes that no Jewish child should be denied a day school education for financial reasons. Registration at day schools is declining in Toronto, and regrettably, recent newspaper coverage and misinformation being circulated by some individuals in the community about tuition fee hikes is not helping matters.

Tuition fees are rising in day schools across the system for a number of reasons. Enrolments will likely decline in the next few years for demographic and financial reasons, and operating costs – with salaries as the largest component – will rise. Unfortunately, funding by UJA Federation to families in need has been frozen for more than a decade. During this time, there has been a proliferation of new day schools that require significant financial commitment. In addition, parents in our schools justifiably want us to invest in quality programs in both Judaic and general studies.

While Associated has cut more than $800,000 in operating costs next year, none of these cuts compromise the quality of our programs. Our tuition fees have gone up $1,800 between 1998-99 and 2003-04, but during that time, we have introduced new programs for the enrichment of our children at a cost of $3.7 million.

At a recent town hall meeting, our school executive went to great pains to explain the need for a $1,000 tuition increase that still keeps us below the costs of other day schools. Our tuition committee has been advised to be particularly sensitive to the needs of families who are struggling. Our school, along with many others, will continue to make necessary budget reductions to cover costs. We cannot only look to our parent body to cover the cost of funding the school.

Hopefully, increases of $1,000 will not be required in the future, and parents should rest assured that schools such as Associated, in conjunction with the community at large, will work to ensure that proper funding continues.

Further, all of us must also take steps to encourage our elected officials to preserve the provincial education tax credit.

Jewish continuity is best achieved by a strong Jewish day school system that can provide a superior education at a fair cost. To keep children in the system, we must continue to enrich programs and provide remedial teaching assistance.

It is time for our leaders to get behind the schools. Our system is the envy of many other communities, we should be proud of it, and we should continue to support Jewish education.

Sheldon Carr
President, Associated Hebrew Schools

On 'the miracle of modern Hebrew'

Allow me to congratulate The CJN on its initiative to commission essays commemorating the 55th anniversary of the founding of the State of Israel. The article discussing modern Hebrew, written by Channa Pinchasi provided interesting insights on the language's development in the last century ("The miracle of modern Hebrew," CJN, May 15).

While the article made appropriate and well- deserved reference to the contributions of Eliezer Ben-Yehuda, it failed to make reference to Reuven Brainin, one of the leading popularizers in Hebrew of ideas current in European literature. This omission by the author is all the more disappointing in light of Brainin's strong Canadian connection as a co-founder of the Jewish Public Library in Montreal and editor of the Kanader Adler.

I believe that contributions to Israel made by members of the Canadian Jewish community would be of particular interest to CJN readership and should be highlighted.

Locating Mount Sinai

Shavuot, the holiday commemorating the Jews' receiving of the Torah at Mount Sinai, begins tonight. The CJN asked archeologist Emmanuel Anati to write about an expedition he has been leading in the Negev Desert that has found much evidence to indicate that Har Karkom is the Mount Sinai of the Bible. The team's research is sponsored by the Centro Camuno di Studi Preistorici, Italy, in co-operation with the Antiquities Authority and the Archeological Survey of Israel, and supported by the cultural relations department of the Italian Ministry of Foreign Affairs. The second part of this essay will be published next week.

Since 1980 the plateau-shaped mountain, Har Karkom in the Negev Desert and the surrounding valleys have been under study. Twenty-three years of archeological expeditions have allowed a thorough survey of 200 square kilometres.

By EMMANUEL ANATI

Each expedition has provided fresh evidence, and now, nearly 1,300 archeological sites are known in the surveyed area. Many of them belong to the Late Chalcolithic Age, the Early Bronze Age and the beginning of the Middle Bronze Age, a period dating back to the fourth and the third millennia BCE that is referred to as BAC, or Bronze Age Complex. Remains of numerous villages of this period are found in the valleys surrounding the mountain, while the high plateau is covered by sites of cult and worship.

The archeological investigation in this area has produced an immense documentation on the way of life, the social structure, the economy, the habits and the beliefs of ancient desert people. It was clear from the beginning of the survey that Har Karkom was a paramount cult centre in the fourth and third millennia BCE where large groups of people came and built their camps at the foothills. Some of them climbed to the plateau to perform worship activities. Pillars, stone circles, geoglyphs or large pebble drawings on the ground, tumuli (mounds of earth), altar-like structures, peculiar round platforms with "altars" on top of them, are clear indications of religious activities. The enormous amount of religious rock art (more than 40,000 figures), alignments of pillars, the remains on the plateau of a small temple (a structure with a rectangular altar-like platform facing east) and at least five more at the foot of the mountain, indicate the paramount importance of this mountain for the Bronze Age inhabitants of the desert. Har Karkom presents a unique aggregation of evidence of religious activities.

Although Har Karkom's religious character was quite evident, no connection was made at first between that mountain and Mount Sinai. The team had never before questioned the traditional belief that the Exodus had occurred sometime around the 13th century BCE, assuming this to be an established "fact." There is no evidence of any human occupation at Har Karkom in the 13th century BCE, or for centuries before and after. Indeed, the usual date accepted for the Exodus is right in the middle of a long archeological gap at Har Karkom, a gap that concerns most of the Sinai Peninsula if military and trading stations aside are left. In fact, the description of daily life of Midianites, Amalekites, Amorites, Horites and other tribes appearing in the Bible, if not pure mythology, must refer to either before or after the second millennium BCE.

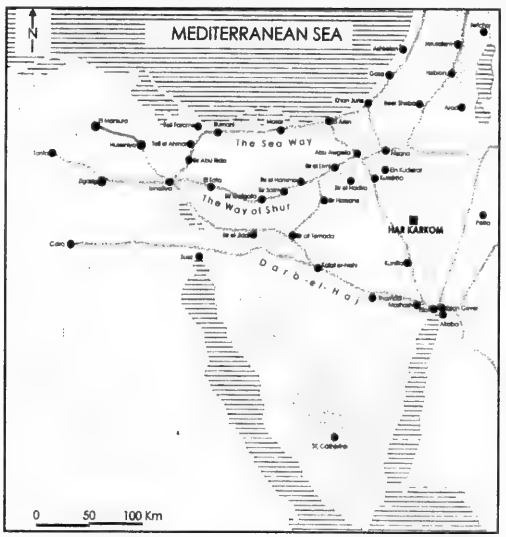
Another factor that at first prevented scholars from considering any relationship between Har Karkom and the Exodus was the location of this mountain on the edge of the "Promised Land," along a desert route from Egypt to Palestine, facing the area named Paran Desert, but far from any previously proposed itinerary of Exodus. Since Byzantine times, the biblical Mount Sinai was believed to be in the south of the peninsula, although this view is not corroborated by biblical accounts.

Some scholars viewed the wanderings of the children of Israel in the desert as random movements from one well to another. Others saw it as a route used to travel from Egypt to the Byzantine St. Catharine, and from there to Ain Kudeirat, which is believed to be Kadesh-Barnea in the north of the peninsula, not far from Har Karkom. There were several other hypotheses, but none considered the Har Karkom area. And, of course, there are a number of authors who claim that the account of Exodus is just a mythical story with no historical basis. In any case, the itinerary described must have been topographically meaningful to people from the first millennium BCE who were acquainted with the region. In 1989, and again in 1992, we surveyed various hypotheses on the itinerary of the Exodus in the Egyptian Sinai. We verified that several names and descriptions of the Exodus stations were identifiable and we reconstructed the itinerary in the book Esodo tra mito e storia (Capo di Ponte, Edizioni del Centro, 1997).

The idea that Har Karkom might be identified with the biblical Mount Sinai came after four years of surveying the mountain and 30 years after our discovery of rock art there. So on the basis of topographic and archeological evidence, it was proposed that Har Karkom may be identified with the holy mountain referred to in biblical narrations as Mount Sinai (The Mountain of God, New York, Rizzoli, 1986; The Riddle of Mount Sinai, Capo di Ponte, Edizioni del Centro, 2001).

Several scholars had previously thought that Mount Sinai should be located in the north rather than in the south of the Sinai Peninsula. But the identification of a specific site, one that relied on pertinent archeological findings, was a new fact that scandalized some, was accepted by others and stimulated wide debates.

The new proposal immediately found itself under fire from two directions. On one side were those who simply accepted a well-established cathechism on the location of Mount Sinai. Their comments were nonfactual, like: "Everybody knows that Jebel Musa is Mount Sinai, there is no reason for discussing the matter," or, "Mount Sinai must be the highest mountain in the Peninsula," or, "Since the site of the Burning Bush is at St. Catharine, the mountain cannot be far away." Others claimed that "a bunch of nomads in the desert do not leave traces." This last statement is simply wrong. At Har Karkom and in other areas of the Negev and Sinai, we found traces of numerous camping sites belonging to nomads, from Paleolithic times to Islamic times (though none from the Late Bronze Age).



On the other side were those who could not agree with our chronology. They said, "Since the Exodus took place in the 13th century BCE, Mount Sinai should have at its foot [the] remains of 13th-century camping sites." Should the date be as certain as some believe, this rule should apply to any site candidate for Mount Sinai, not just to Har Karkom. It is probable that not a single mountain in the Sinai Peninsula would fit because the 13th century BCE is part of a hiatus in settlement.

But we found other kinds of hostile reaction. Some scholars simply did not like to admit that they may have been wrong. An eminent biblist said, "I have been teaching for 30 years that Mount Sinai is Jebel Musa. How would one expect me to change my position at my age?"

To the best of our knowledge, besides the Greek Orthodox Church, no other denomination so far has taken an official position about Mount Sinai's location. The debate among theologians, biblical scholars and archeologists remains open. Nevertheless, the immense wealth of cult sites at Har Karkom proves that it was a paramount holy mountain in the Bronze Age. No such evidence has been found at any other Mount Sinai candidate.

In the books of Exodus and Numbers, Mount Sinai appears to be located between the desert of Sin and the desert of Paran, between the land of Amalek and the land of Midian, between Eilim and the "Hill Road of the Amorites." Other passages in the Bible provide information about the location of the above-mentioned deserts, and about the territories of the Amalekites, the Midianites and the Amorites. In the story of Moses in Midian, Mount Sinai is described as being on the edge of the pasture land of Midian and on the way between Jethro's residence and Egypt.

At the beginning of Deuteronomy, it is written, "It takes 11 days from Horeb, by the way of Mount Seir, to Kadesh-Barnea." For many scholars, even among those who do not agree with the identification of Har Karkom, Kadesh-Barnea is identified with Ain Kudeirat (or with the nearby Ain Kadis), and Mount Seir with Jebel Arif el-Naqa. In fact, there is a good trail between Har Karkom and Ain Kudeirat, by the way of Jebel Arif el-Naqa; along it there are 10 groups of wells at distances of seven to 14 miles from each other. Therefore, if Har Karkom is Mount Sinai, it takes a person who walks on foot exactly 11 days from Horeb by the way of Mount Seir to reach Kadesh-Barnea.

The Bible describes deserts and tribal areas around Mount Sinai. One of the main emerging points is that Mount Sinai, according to the narration, must be located on or near the border between the land of Midian and the land of Amalek. The Bible indicates that the Amalekites occupied the highlands of the central Negev and the area of Kadesh Barnea, and the Midianites were on both sides of the Araba Valley. Mount Sinai, according to the biblical narration, should be located between these two regions, meaning in the Har Karkom area.

Emmanuel Anati is the head of the Har Karkom Archaeological Survey and the director of the Centro Camuno di Studi Preistorici.

The logic of suicide terrorism

I attended a conference in Ramat Gan last month. For me, this visit to Israel, like so many others before it, was filled with positive expectation – that combination of nostalgia and a special sense of excitement that always seems to define my mood as my departure date approaches.

Lawrence Hart in Hamilton

But, perhaps even more intensely with this trip than with previous ones, my inevitable reality check came when people I work with expressed anxieties about whether it is even safe to go to Israel right now. After all, a terrorist bomb could go off just about anywhere, they said, so why take the risk?

And while it is relatively easy to dismiss well-intentioned concerns about where not to go and what not to do when there, it is nonetheless troubling to recognize that the pervasive uncertainty created by suicide bombers has, in fact, become almost as important a factor in their overall strategy as the actual carnage that they've been able to get away with.

What is apparent in today's Israel is that the fear factor permeates many aspects of daily life. Seemingly simple tasks often require intricate planning – as just getting from point A to point B might have dire consequences if sufficient care is not taken.

In the June issue of the Atlantic Monthly, Bruce Hoffman, the author of the book Inside Terrorism, had the following to say about what he describes as the "logic of suicide terrorism:" "First you feel nervous about riding the bus. Then you wonder about going to a mall. Then you think twice about sitting for long at your favourite café. Then nowhere seems safe. Terrorist groups have a strategy – to shrink to nothing the areas in which people move freely – and suicide bombers, inexpensive and reliably lethal, are their latest weapons".

Hoffman's insights are accurate. With armed guards at the entrances to most public places and with obvious signs of heightened security at the airport and in the form of roadblocks near population centres outside major cities, there are certainly enough reminders in Israel that the situation is far from normal in that part of the world.

But aside from its human toll, the ongoing terror campaign continues to have a devastating effect on Israel's economy in general and on tourism in particular.

It is sad, though not especially surprising, that so many potential visitors have chosen to remove Israel from their travel itineraries. However, what is especially unfortunate about is that the promoters of terrorism would have us believe that this, in itself, reflects the victory for their cause. If so, what a hollow and tragic victory it is.

Shame on Israel for ignoring Armenian genocide

Some things just don't get easier with time. A few weeks ago, for the 13th time since immigrating to Israel in 1990, I again grappled with the abrupt switchover from the sadness and solemnity of Memorial Day to the unbridled festivities of Independence Day.

Robert Sarner in Jerusalem

But this year, it was not just the emotional somersault that left me uneasy. As I watched on TV the official ceremony that kicked off Israel's 55th birthday, something else disturbed and disappointed me. It still does.

Call me naive. Call me myopic. Call me a misguided party-pooper. Call me whatever you like, but I expect better from my country.

Every year, shortly after Memorial Day ends at sunset, Israel begins its Independence Day celebrations with a moving open-air ceremony, televised live from Jerusalem's Mount Herzl. It includes the traditional lighting of 12 torches, representing the 12 tribes of the biblical Israelites. A ministerial committee selects the torchbearers in recognition of their contributions to society and to represent different segments of the population.

This year, Naomi Nalbandian was one of the 12 honorees. An Israeli of Armenian origin, she was selected in appreciation of her work with terror victims at Jerusalem's Hadassah Hospital, where she is a senior nurse.

Torchbearers prepare a few sentences to introduce themselves at the ceremony and to put in the event program. Initially, Nalbandian wrote that her grandparents fled Armenia and settled near Haifa in 1920 after passing through Lebanon and Syria. She described herself as "a third-generation survivor of the Armenian genocide, which took place in 1915."

But just before Independence Day, the Turkish Embassy in Tel Aviv learned that an Israeli Armenian was chosen for the ceremony and that, horror of horrors, she intended to refer to the genocide of the Armenians. In customary fashion, the country threw a temper tantrum.

Turkey is especially sensitive about the Armenians, having long denied its role in their mass murder. Armenians charge that between 1915 and 1923, the Turks killed some 1.5 million of their people through executions, starvation and forced marches. Most historians – including Jewish Holocaust experts – agree and recognize this as genocide. For its part, Turkey maintains that while some 600,000 Armenians may have died, it was an unfortunate result of war for which it was not responsible.

The Turkish ambassador in Israel was furious over the decision to have an Armenian light a torch even though she didn't plan to cite Turkey by name in her genocide reference. Turkey demanded a clarification from Jerusalem on whether Nalbandian's text represented a change in Israeli policy, which has always avoided blaming Turkey for the atrocities, or even fully acknowledging them.

The Prime Minister's Office, the Foreign Ministry and the Knesset all tried to placate Turkey. Knesset Speaker Reuven Rivlin and other officials entered the fray, persuading Nalbandian to delete the word "genocide" and instead refer only to "the suffering of the Armenian people." Nalbandian said she was disappointed but added she did not want to create problems for Israel.

On government orders, organizers scrapped the 4,000 programs already printed for the event. New ones were quickly printed at the last minute. The offensive words were also hastily erased from a plaque created for the ceremony. In the end, Turkey could rest easy as Nalbandian lit the torch and kept to the sanitized script. I cringed.

Admittedly, Turkey is a key regional ally of Israel. It's the only Muslim country with which Jerusalem enjoys warm relations. It provides strategic military co-operation and may one day even supply some of our fresh water. This is all highly important and should not be discounted.

Still, Israel should not deny another people's tragedy just to placate Turkey. Surely, if there is one country and one people that should be sensitive to this, it's Israel and the Jews who are justly outraged by the obscenity of Holocaust deniers.

Lamentably, Israel's caving in to Turkey's intimidation on the eve of Independence Day is only the latest episode in Jerusalem's consistently spineless, evasive policy over the years. Such a suppression of truth and history is a blight on Israel's name. By our failure to recognize this genocide, we are helping victimize the Armenians again. We should know better.

Canada's confused Middle East policy

What is euphemistically referred to as the "road map for peace in the Middle East" has been, at least so far, the latest version of diplomatic theatre, in which words and action are entirely disconnected.

Gerald Steinberg in Jerusalem

After the Oslo disaster, few Israelis expect to see a positive result this time. While the new Palestinian Authority prime minister, Mahmoud Abbas, chairs meetings and greets dignitaries, PA President Yasser Arafat continues to pull the strings and orchestrate terror attacks. And although the United States, Europe, the United Nations and Russia have formed a "quartet" to co-ordinate policy, they remain hopelessly out of tune.

As is often the case, Canada is caught in the middle. Ottawa's policies do not reflect consistent principles or national interest, but reflect a course mid-way between the major powers.

In the Cold War, this meant membership in NATO while keeping lines open with Moscow and Havana. But after the collapse of the Soviet empire, a new cold war has been developing between Washington and Brussels (the headquarters of the European Union).

The fight erupted in full force over Iraq and has spilled over to postwar projects including Arab-Israeli issues. The continuing pilgrimages to Arafat by Europe's political leaders are designed to spite the United States (and Israel) rather than to achieve substantive goals.

In this environment, Canada's foreign minister, Bill Graham, with the backing of Prime Minister Jean Chrétien, is again trying to please all sides – the Americans, the Europeans, the Palestinians and, perhaps, the Israelis.

A few weeks ago, Graham was planning to join the European migration to the remnants of Arafat's headquarters in Ramallah. When he belatedly realized that this would be understood as Canadian support for Arafat's continuing involvement in terrorism and would undermine regime change in the Palestinian Authority, Graham postponed the visit indefinitely.

This episode is sadly symptomatic of Canadian policy in the region.

While couched in lofty terms such as "peace making" and "human security," Canada's actions in the Middle East reflect far more parochial considerations.

The reflexive anti-Americanism of Canadian academics, journalists, and the political left is also entrenched in the foreign policy bureaucracy and leads to anti-Israel positions. In addition, the media image of Palestinian victimization that is central to the BBC's Mideast coverage and is often reflected automatically by the CBC has an enormous impact on Canadian government policy. The single-minded focus on Israeli "settlements and occupation," ignoring history before 1967 and decades of terrorist attacks, is fundamentally wrong-headed.

For all of these reasons, Canada's role in Israeli-Arab peacemaking efforts is in urgent need of a thorough overhaul. Clearly, the effort to make policy based on an emotional need to show independence from Washington (meaning adopting an anti-Israeli position) is foolish and destructive.

Furthermore, the concept of even-handedness that many Canadian policy-makers and academics believe to be necessary for effective mediation has also been shown to be without foundation. Instead, this artificial balance has destroyed Canada's claim to a moral foreign policy based on opposition to violence and hatred. And, in any case, Canada is not a major party in Arab-Israeli negotiations, particularly after the self-destruction of the United Nations around the issue of Iraq.

Instead, Canadian foreign policy-makers and politicians, including Graham and his successors, should be encouraged to develop a realistic policy independent of the new U.S.-EU cold war.

Canada can do its bit by funding Palestinian textbooks and television shows that support the acceptance of Israel's legitimacy, and halting funds to so-called "human rights" groups that actually promote hatred and terrorism. In Geneva, the Canadian delegation has distanced itself from the ridiculous excesses of the misnamed UN Commission on Human Rights (headed by Libya!), but in other areas, Canada is silent when the UN is continually misused to promote anti-Israeli propaganda.

Most importantly, to play a serious role, Canada's foreign policy-makers need a strong dose of realism. The myths that start history in 1967 and the propaganda map that focuses on "settlements," "occupation" and Palestinian victimization need to be replaced by a map that reflects the threats to Israel's survival from a very hostile Middle East.

In these ways, Canada can provide modest help in trying to prevent the latest "road map" to peace from sharing the catastrophic fate of all its predecessors.

The Kirshner File

Where are all those weapons of mass destruction?

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

What ever happened to Iraq's proscribed weapons of mass destruction? This burning question is posed with increasing frequency now that Saddam Hussein's Baathist regime has been consigned to the dustbin of history.

Nearly three months after the United States and its allies – Britain, Australia and Poland – invaded Iraq, Iraq's chemical, biological and nuclear weapons, and the long-range missiles capable of delivering them have yet to be found.

That the United States has come up empty is a major disappointment and embarrassment. After all, the most compelling rationale for the invasion and the regime change hinged on these fearsome weapons. As Ari Fleischer, President George W. Bush's press secretary, succinctly put it, "This is what this war was about."

But as of last week, the United States had yet to uncover a "smoking gun" – hard, concrete, irrefutable evidence that such weapons were, in fact, in Iraq's possession.

This contentious issue has been on the international agenda since the first Gulf War.

After a coalition of nations, spearheaded by the United States, drove Iraq out of Kuwait in 1991, the United Nations Security Council passed Resolution 687.

Under its terms, the United Nations Special Commission (UNSCOM) was charged with tracking down and destroying what was left of this deadly arsenal.

Iraq was expected to co-operate, but its co-operation was at best spotty and at worst non-existent.

In some instances, Iraqi officials grudgingly led inspectors to arms caches. But in other cases, they manifestly tried to obstruct their mission, which was never easy in a country the size of California.

Luck was also a factor. When Saddam's son-in-law – a towering figure in Iraq's military industrial complex – defected, he told the UN where a significant biological weapons storage was located – a chicken farm on the outskirts of Baghdad, of all places.

As a result of continuing Iraqi interference, the UN pulled its inspection teams out of Iraq in 1998. By then, Iraq had been largely defanged, in the view of UNSCOM.

From 1998 until the resumption of inspections last November, Iraq had a completely free hand in rebuilding its arsenal of unconventional weapons. By all accounts, Saddam took full advantage of this situation, the UN's array of economic sanctions notwithstanding.

In the aftermath of the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks in Manhattan and Washington, D.C., the Bush administration began singling out Iraq as a threat to its security and that of its allies in the Middle East.

The claim, as it related directly to the Mideast, was plausible, given Iraq's aggressive policies and its expansionist designs. Iraq deployed mustard gas and other banned chemicals against Iranian soldiers in the 1980-1988 Iran-Iraq War. Iraq gassed its Kurdish citizens in the late 1980s. Iraq fired Scud missiles at Israel, Saudi Arabia and Kuwait during the 1991 Gulf War. And as Saddam himself acknowledged, he was animated by megalomanical visions of a greater Iraq.

Bending to relentless pressures, Iraq agreed to re-admit UN weapons inspectors. The job of monitoring Iraq was conducted by UNMOVIC, the United Nations Monitoring, Verification and Inspection Commission. It was co-headed by Hans Blix, a former Swedish foreign minister and director general of the International Atomic Energy Agency. Under the division of labour, Blix hunted for chemical and biological weapons while his colleague, Mohamed El Baradei, an Egyptian, searched for nuclear weapons.

The mission was plagued by an intrinsic disagreement.

The United States, working on the assumption that Iraq had acquired new weapons in the interval from 1998 to 2002, expected Iraq to lead the inspectors to the caches, or, at the very least, to prove it had no illegal weapons. Vehemently denying it had any such weapons, Iraq adopted a basically passive role, much to Washington's ire.

From November 2002 to March 2003, UNMOVIC inspectors carried out more than 700 surprise visits to hundreds of Iraqi sites and interviewed a few Iraqi scientists. Nothing of value emerged from these inspections. The United States claimed that Iraq had refined concealment to a fine art and that only Saddam's ouster could finally establish the truth.

In his State of the Union speech this past January, Bush claimed that Iraq had upwards of 30,000 warheads, 500 tons of chemical weapons, 25,000 litres of anthrax and 38,000 litres of botulinum toxin.

He also said that Iraq was trying to build nuclear bombs.

On Feb. 4, in an attempt to rally world opinion, Saddam told a British interviewer that Iraq had "no weapons of mass destruction whatsoever."

The following day, Colin Powell, the U.S. secretary of state, presented the Bush administration's definitive case for going to war to disarm Iraq. He displayed satellite photographs, intercepts of conversations between Iraqi army officers and data from Iraqi defectors. Despite his suggestion that military action might well be unavoidable, Security Council members such as France and Russia insisted that UN inspections should continue. Blix and El Baradei agreed with this assessment.

With the eruption of war on March 19, the United States dispatched the 75th Exploitation Task Force to search for banned weapons. It concentrated its efforts on 90 high-priority sites, from the headquarters of Iraq's Military Industrialization Commission to the Amiriyah Serum and Vaccine Institute.

Colin Powell

But at many of these sensitive sites, looters and intruders had already sacked and burned evidence. What material of interest that did turn up, from dual-use biological equipment and nerve gas antidotes to gas masks and artillery shells, failed the test as "smoking gun" exhibits.

Compounding the frustration was last week's disclosure that two mobile laboratories found recently did not contain traces of biological agents.

Several high-ranking Iraqi scientists have given themselves up or have been captured. They include Huda Salih Mahdi Ammash, a senior biologist in Iraq's biological warfare program; Abd al-Khaliq Abd al-Ghafir, Saddam's scientific research minister; Hossam Mohammed Amin, Iraq's chief liaison with UN weapons inspectors; Amir al-Saadi, Saddam's senior weapons advisor; and Emad Hussein Abdullah al-Ani, a scientist instrumental in Iraq's drive to develop the nerve agent VX.

It remains to be seen whether they will be helpful, but if al-Saadi is typical of this bunch, they will not readily pass on incriminating information to the United States. After he surrendered to U.S. Marines, al-Saadi repeated the mantra that Iraq is clean of weapons of mass destruction.

Subsequently, The New York Times reported that an important Iraqi scientist had informed the United States that Iraq had destroyed its stocks of chemical weapons and biological warfare equipment in the days before the outbreak of the latest Gulf war and that Iraq had sent unconventional weapons and technology to Syria in the mid-1990s.

Bush also raised this possibility a month-and-a-half ago.

Still, as a senior U.S. army commander said last month, American forces have collected a pile of evidence suggesting that Iraq had an active weapons program. According to Donald Rumsfeld, the U.S. secretary of defence, the pieces will fall into place only with the active assistance of Iraqi scientists and military officers. Judging by a newly announced rewards program, they will presumably be paid for talking.

There is much to be done.

Gen. Tommy Franks, the outgoing commander of allied forces in Iraq, has said that 2,000 to 3,000 possible weapons sites have been identified. Cognizant of this awesome challenge, the United States has reorganized and upgraded the 75th Exploitation Task Force, which, in the future, will be known as the Iraq Survey Group.

Scott Ritter, a former UN inspector and a vocal critic of U.S. policy, claims that Iraq's weapons of mass destruction no longer exist.

But the United States is adamantly sticking to its story. "We know [Saddam] had them, and whether he destroyed them, moved them or hid them, we're going to find out the truth," Bush has declared. Gen. Richard Myers, the chair of the U.S. Joint Chiefs of Staff, has said that finding them is "just a matter of time."

Amid this debate, the Central Intelligence Agency has launched a review to ascertain whether the United States overstated the Iraqi threat. Whatever the outcome of the investigation, Washington really has nothing to fear. Iraq was a clear and present menace to the region, and if the United States had not intervened, Saddam surely would have destabilized the Middle East, sooner or later.

He had to go.

Perle urges Palestinians to scrap 'culture of death'

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

The road map, the internationally sponsored Mideast peace plan supported by the United States, may not endure unless the Palestinians scrap their "culture of death" and stop demonizing Israel, neo-conservative American foreign affairs analyst Richard Perle said here last week.

"If this doesn't happen, we may end up with an agreement that doesn't last," he told an Israel Bonds/ UJA Federation luncheon meeting at the Sheraton Centre Hotel.

Perle, who served as U.S. assistant secretary of defence during the Reagan administration, warned that the prospect of "stable peace" will be stifled unless the Palestinian Authority ceases its Jihadist incitement against Israel.

Throughout the now-defunct Oslo peace process, he observed, Palestinians were indoctrinated in the "culture of death." They were taught to hate and kill Jews, and official Palestinian maps omitted Israel.

If peace is to prevail, these practices must stop, said Perle, a consultant to the U.S. department of defence and a member of the Defence Policy Board and a resident fellow of the American Enterprise Institute for Public Policy Research, both based in Washington, D.C.

Richard Perle

Perle said that within three weeks of the first Oslo accord in September 1993, PA President Yasser Arafat violated the letter and spirit of the agreement by delivering a speech in which he called for jihad, or holy war.

If the road map is to succeed, Perle said, such violations must not re-occur.

It is too soon to pass judgment on the new Palestinian prime minister, Mahmoud Abbas, despite his flirtation with Holocaust denial. He should be given a chance and not be dismissed based on what he wrote in the past, Perle said.

Backing calls for Arafat's exile, Perle said, "I'd rather see him on the French Riviera than in Ramallah. He'd be much more comfortable there."

Perle said the weight of international law sanctions Israel's occupation of the West Bank and Gaza.

"But the occupation has gone on too long," he asserted, implying that Israel should withdraw from the territories in exchange for peace and secure and defensible borders.

A future Palestinian state must be demilitarized, Perle said. But he predicted the Palestinians will resist demilitarization.

And they consider the "right of return" an article of faith, he added.

"What troubles me is that it is a card – a very dangerous card – that can be played in any number of ways to prevent an agreement."

The issue, therefore, should not be left to the tail end of negotiations.

Perle said "some formula" for resolving Jerusalem's final status can be found once the other central issues are settled.

"If there's a will to peace, something can be done on Jerusalem."

Blasting the European Union for having coddled Arafat and for being "too biased" in its approach to the Arab-Israeli dispute, Perle said Israel erred in agreeing to the EU's sponsorship of the road map and participation in talks.

Perle said that peace and democracy in the Middle East are inextricably linked because authoritarian Arab regimes encourage hostility against Israel and breed xenophobia.

So the attempt by the United States to bring democracy to the region is well worth the effort.

Describing the allied invasion of Iraq as a "war of liberation," Perle said Iraqis can look forward to an era of freedom, but patience will be required before Iraq is transformed into a democracy.

Accusing Iran of being "up to its eyeballs" in support of terrorism, Perle said that Iran is "a threat to all of us."

The United States will continue to isolate Iran by diplomatic means, he said.

But within 12 to 18 months, he forecast, "peaceful change" will sweep through Iran because most young Iranians are fed up with theocratic rule.

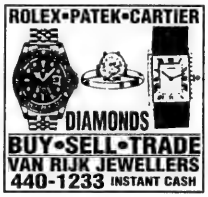
Perle castigated the Saudi Arabian government, saying it feeds terrorist organizations around the world and tolerates the extremist Wahhabist doctrine of holy war against "infidels" and the United States.

He was also critical of the United Nations, saying it must be reformed to deal with the spectre of state-sponsored terrorism.

The UN, he said, was founded to cope with 20th century threats and advised that it should change its charter so that state sponsorship of terror is considered inadmissable. He also urged Canada to take the lead in bringing about such reform.

The lesson the United States has learned from Sept. 11 is that it must not wait too long before responding to a clear and present danger, Perle said.

"Everything we did after Sept. 11 we could have done before Sept. 11," he said, referring to the American invasions of Afghanistan and Iraq and the campaign against terrorism.



"I lost 49 pounds. Hypnosis put me back in control!"

My name is Stacey Harrington. I dropped 49 pounds in five short months and made my marriage sizzle.

BEFORE

I couldn't stop eating. I had become overweight during my first year of college. My weight kept increasing from there. In desperation, I started dieting.

I felt starved and deprived. Once I stopped the program, I gained my weight back plus more.

I was easily insulted in those days. People told me, "You have such a pretty face." I knew what they meant: Too bad you're so fat.

I was desperate, yet I couldn't stop eating. I craved and binged. Every day I'd hide a sleeve of chips in my desk drawer.

One day I saw a story in the newspaper about a woman who had lost 47 lbs. I wanted to look like her. I called to schedule my free weight loss consultation.

Glimmer of Hope. I told my consultant about my past failures. How my weight was hurting my marriage. She understood.

Choosing hypnosis was the best decision of my life. I lost my weight at an average of 10 lbs. a month: 49 lbs. in all. When I first started, I was stretching the seams on my size 16 jeans. I recently bought my first pair of size 6's!

Easy and Fun! I noticed a change in my eating habits after my first session. When I'm full, I stop eating. I don't feel like I'm depriving myself. I don't fight it with will power. It's automatic.

Passport to a New Life. I used to let the scale determine my mood in the morning. Now, I just wake up in a good mood. I no longer think about my weight. If I'm thirsty, I reach for a glass of water. If I'm hungry, I eat a well-balanced meal.

AFTER

Before hypnosis I stayed home all the time. I didn't want people to see me. Now I'm out and about all the time.

I've thrown out all my fat clothes. I would never have done that before. That's how confident I am that I've lost my weight for good.

One night my husband gazed into my eyes and said, "Stacey, I think you're the sexiest woman alive." The best part was that I believed him. I actually felt sexy. Our passion has been sizzling ever since.

I have not been paid to write this. I believe in hypnosis. It's given me my life back.

Now it's up to you. If you're feeling miserable and desperate about your weight, don't wait another minute. Just pick up the phone and call. Don't worry. They won't pressure you. So call now. If you're like me, it will be the best decision of your life.

Sunny spirits dominate Walk with Israel 2003

By JENNIFER M. PAQUETTE
Special to The CJN

For some, it was their first time. For others, UJA Federation of Toronto's annual Walk with Israel is a family tradition.

Brian Cohen, 14, of the Community Hebrew Academy's Richmond Hill campus said he has been coming for at least seven years with his family. This year, he volunteered to pick up litter on a downtown street corner.

"Somebody's got to do it," said fellow litter scooper Mark Rootenberg, 15, who visited Israel several years ago. He said he enjoyed seeing "the Western Wall and...the past of Jerusalem."

Jacob Steinfeld, 15 and also on trash detail, attended this year for the first time. "I didn't expect this many people!" he said.

The turnout for this year's walk, on Sunday, May 25, was around 20,000, nearly the same as last year.

According to UJA Federation spokesperson Howard English, that makes it the largest Israel solidarity walk in the world.

"New York has a parade, but as far as a walk goes, there is no community in the world that shows as much support. To be able to get 20,000 members of our community out for one event is an outstanding achievement," English said.

"So much for 16 millimetres of rain!" one man cheered as the sun dissolved the fog, brightening what had promised to be a third straight rainy year for the event.

Though most walkers were parents with young children, many extended families walked together.

Gloria Howard brought her granddaughter, Jennie, 12, and a friend, Zoë, from West Preparatory School, where the two girls are in Grade 6. "It's fun to do it as a family thing," Howard said.

English said the walk has become a tradition over its 33-year history. "It began... as the UJA Walkathon, but over past few years, it's been designated as a solidarity walk with Israel."

This year's walk, he said, raised about the same as last year, $500,000 – out of a total of $65 million raised by the UJA for its Israel Emergency Campaign 2003. Funds raised from walk pledges go "specifically toward victims of terror and other vulnerable Israelis."

Toronto's Jewish community is unique, English said.

"Toronto's Jewish community is so important to the Diaspora... Around the world everyone knows the connection of our community with Israel," he said. "Despite everything going in the world, and despite the fact that it turned out to be a beautiful sunny day [which] people could have spent... doing many other things, they put Israel first – they showed the world."

This special bond was also felt by many native Israelis.

[Jennifer Paquette photo]

Isaac Pessah, who came to Canada 30 years ago, said "it's great to see the atmosphere." His wife, Anat, who's arrived four years ago, said she saw a lot of her students from the Paul Penna Downtown Jewish Day School. Events like these, Pessah said, benefit Israel, but also strengthen us as a community.

"It's nice to see the community come together," shouted Rabbi Jay Kelman of Beth Jacob V'Anshei Drildz Congregation over the music and din of a super-sized wrap-up event, with clowns and inflatable amusements, at the National Trade Centre at Exhibition Place.

"It's so important, we even came with five kids."

He added that even when his now 5-year-old daughter "was born on the Friday before the walk... we came on Sunday."

Other attractions for those who finished the nearly 5-km, three-checkpoint walk included a drumming workshop, kosher cotton candy and a seven-foot Magen David crafted out of more than 200 individual balloons by entertainer Sean Rooney.

Doubling Your GIC Returns

Insured Annuities - Lifetime Guarantees of 9% Plus

With interest rates at their lowest level in 40 years and stock markets in the doldrums, many investors seek more attractive and less stressful investments.

If you are at retirement age and trying to maximize spendable income from non-RRSP savings, insured annuities provide the best of both worlds - significantly higher after-tax income for life and the capital guaranteed tax-free returned to your estate. The older you are, the higher the yield.

The following example, compares the investment of $200,000 invested in a GIC at 5% with an insured annuity, for a male aged 75.

GIC versus Insured Annuity

About 20,000 turn out to show support for Israel

"Aren't you dizzy?" a boy asked, as he watched Rooney delicately pinch off the balloons and link them together. "I'm dizzy most of the time," Rooney said, with a grin.

Even those without young children were getting into the spirit. "We've come the last three years," Ed Yuditsky said. "We're here on our own," said his wife, Evelyn.

"We come down every year to support Israel with this

Other walkers showed that you don't even have to be human to support Israel. Devoted canine companions trotted alongside walkers, many decked out, including Licorice, Jackie Valmont's five-year-old Yorkie-Poo, in Walk bandanas and blue-and-white flags.

"We do this every year," Valmont said. Though Licorice was born and raised in Toronto, in his heart, Valmont said, "he's an Israeli dog."

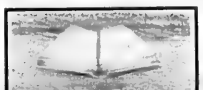
All ingredients are necessary for a recipe

By RABBI MORDECAI E. ZEITZ

Think about any Jewish holiday and you will think of a significant Jewish symbol. Symbols and symbolic acts are a major part of every Jewish holiday celebration. There's a shofar on Rosh Hashanah; fasting on Yom Kippur; a Sukkah, etrog and lulav on Sukkot; and matzah and all the seder trappings on Pesach. Even the post-biblical holidays of Chanukah and Purim have unique symbols and practices, with each one reflecting the story and special message of that occasion.



Rabbinic Reflections

But what about the upcoming festival of Shavuot? What mitzvah or practice really depicts the very essence of Shavuot – the time of our receiving the Torah? The tradition of staying up all night studying Torah is laudable, but not necessarily unique to Shavuot night. Many people study Torah at night throughout the year. Decorating our homes or shul with greenery symbolic of Mount Sinai is a practice most people are unaware of. Initially, there doesn't appear to be anything that we do on Shavuot on the shofar or matzah level.

But of course there is! We eat dairy foods, notably blintzes and/or cheesecake. That's Shavuot, the essence of the time of the receiving of the Torah. It seems ludicrous and highly non-spiritual, but let's give it some serious consideration: Torah, a blintz and lessons from Sinai.

Allow me to give this "blintz" a face. Let's call it Chaim. Chaim loved blintzes. He and his wife were very poor, but Chaim was rich on dreams. One day, he was walking on the street when he smelled the fresh aroma of something wonderful. He followed his nose and there on the ledge of a window was a tray of amazing blintzes. He was tempted, but he was a righteous man and dared not touch. Then the woman who made the blintzes reached for the tray and Chaim seized the moment to ask for the ingredients. She obliged and said: fine flour, eggs, oil and of course, fresh cheese.

Chaim ran home and announced that this Shavuot there would be blintzes because he had the recipe. He could hardly wait for the holiday and spoke about his blintzes every day for a month.

Erev Shavuot, he nudged his wife all day as to when she was going to start the process. To make it easier, he volunteered to help. He would read out the instructions and she would just follow through.

First, he said: "Pour in the fine flour." "But, we have no flour, fine or otherwise," replied his wife. "So use whatever you have and then blend in the eggs and the oil," Chaim said. Said his wife: "but we have no eggs nor oil." An anxious Chaim replied: "Use whatever and stir it and fill it up with cheese and bake them. It's almost Yom Tov."

She did her best. Instead of flour, she used some stale bread crumbs; instead of eggs and oil, she used water and some leftover tea essence, and having no cheese, fresh or otherwise, she just left out that part.

Chaim sat in the other room salivating just thinking about his blintzes to be. He heard the bustle in the kitchen and finally smelled the aroma. They were ready, and after kiddush, so was Chaim.

His wife brought these terrible-looking, hollow things to the table and Chaim took the first bite. They tasted worse than they looked, which was frightful enough.

In disbelief, Chaim turned to his wife and said: "I just don't understand what people see in blintzes. It's just not what it's cracked up to be."

To appreciate the full extent of the "time of the receiving of the Torah" and thus the values of the Torah itself, we need all the ingredients. When and if we have substituted or replaced some of the core ingredients, it's hard to find a reason to celebrate. It's just not the real thing.

While scholarship and knowledge are crucial, it is the resulting value system and lifestyle flowing from Torah that Shavuot celebrates. The ingredients for a meaningful Matan Torah – a celebration of Torah on Shavuot – requires ongoing mutual respect, honesty, integrity and tolerance, of not only knowing and performing mitzvot, but applying the values of those mitzvot in other aspects of our lives. The most significant ingredient for the Sinai experience was six million people feeling and acting as one. Can we possibly celebrate Shavuot without that sense of unity?

There is nothing like a real blintz on Shavuot or anytime. You just need all the original ingredients.

Talk isn't cheap

Books
Bernard Baskin

Words have power. They sing. They hurt. They teach. They sanctify. They were early man's first immeasurable feat of magic. They liberated us from ignorance and our barbarous past. For without these marvelous scribbles that build letters into words, words into sentences, sentences into systems and sciences and creeds, we would be forever confined to the self-isolated prison of the scuttle fish or the chimpanzee.

The accumulated wisdom of the past has been transmitted through words down through five millennia, since the Sumerians first began to scratch cuneiform symbols on clay tablets in their walled cities along the Tigris-Euphrates plain.

Without words there could be no conversation, and conversation is the oldest form of human instruction – and still an indispensable one. Books, scientific discoveries, works of art and perceptions of truth and beauty in any form all require words to explain and complete their meaning; without them they are abracadabra – color to the blind or music to the deaf. Conversation is the handmaid of learning, true religion and free government.

Rabbi Abraham Heschel once said we should choose our words as we would write a cheque. Each additional zero makes a huge difference. We should take as great care with forming the vowels and the consonants that fall from our lips as we do with each number that flows from our pen onto the cheque.

There are words that soothe hurt, that help us face loss. There are words that stir souls, that capture and quicken imaginations, that give us wings. There are words of all colors and hues, and from every land and tongue and time.

Words are a paradox. They are both a curse and a blessing. The Talmud tells of Tobi, the servant of the famous sage Rabbi Shimon Ben Gamliel, who was told to go to the marketplace and buy the best piece of meat he could find. Tobi brought back a piece of tongue. The next day he received the opposite instructions: to bring back the worst piece of meat he could find. Again, Tobi brought back a piece of tongue.

His master was confused. "When I asked you to bring back the best piece of meat, you brought back a tongue," he said. "When I asked you to bring back the worst piece of meat you also brought back a tongue. Please explain your logic!"

Tobi answered, "There is nothing better than a good tongue and nothing worse than a bad one."

How important is the right word? Mark Twain asserted, "The difference between the right word and the almost right word is the difference between lightning and the lightning bug." The Book of Proverbs reminds us, "A word fitly spoken is like apples of gold in pitchers of silver."

Political campaigns, especially, subject us to the multiple dangers of ugly and mendacious rhetoric. A lawyer confided to me that when you have the facts, you pound the facts; when you have the law, you pound the law; when you have neither, you pound the table. A lot of our political campaigns are just exercises in pounding the table.

We denude words and pauperize ourselves by draining them of their deeper significance. "Talk is cheap," we say, and we do our part to keep it so. Perhaps "verbicide," the killing of words and their meaning, is symptomatic of the greater crisis of values and purposes which runs through so much of modern life. Responsibility in our use of words would be a valiant beginning toward a more mature and serious understanding of ourselves and our world.

Shavuot and the Seven Species – part 2

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

"A land of wheat and barley, of grapes and figs, and pomegranates; a land of olive and honey." Deuteronomy 8:8. [http://makeashorterlink.com/?H2CA22F74] As Shavuot approaches, we continue our look at the Seven Species, the special grains and fruits associated with the holiday: wheat, barley, grapes, figs, pomegranates, olives and dates.

One of the fruits offered when the Temple was standing was the fig (t'aynah). The fig holds the distinction of being the first fruit mentioned in the Torah, one whose leaves allow Adam and Eve to cover up. [http://makeashorterlink.com/?D6B7242B4]

If you prefer eating figs to wearing them, check out some of the creations by Jerry Parsons, professor of horticulture at Texas A&M University, whose fig-centred recipes include stuffed fresh figs, poached figs, fig jam and fig ice cream. [http://makeashorterlink.com/?C37A210A4]

According to the Midrash, the pomegranate (rimon) has 613 seeds, corresponding to the number of mitzvot. The fruit was held in such high esteem that it was hung on the Temple's columns and used widely on coins. These days, you can hear silver "rimonim" jangling on the Torah's ornamental finials when the scrolls are carried in shul. [http://makeashorterlink.com/?W12242294] You can ponder the fruit's importance as you dine on pomegranate soup, followed by pomegranate lamb and topped off with pomegranate ginger muffins. [http://homecooking.about.com/library/archive/blmuff16.htm]

When the Torah mentions "honey" it doesn't mean bee honey, but rather honey made by boiling dates with sugar and scooping out the sugar that rises to the top. [http://www.gemsinisrael.com/e_article000039885.htm] Israel exports nine varieties of dates, including medjoul, halawi and zahidi. [http://www.hadiklaim.com] Use them in date pecan bread, lamb tajine with dates and almonds, or in the more than 100 other date recipes at Just Fruit Recipes. [http://makeashorterlink.com/?L18B212B4]

"I am like a green olive tree in the House of God; I trust in the love of God for ever and ever." (Psalms 52:10) In "Olives, Judaism and the Land of Israel," Rabbi Jo David looks at the importance of the olive in Judaism, from its use as a symbol of peace in the story of Noah to that little jug of oil in the story of Chanukah. [http://www.imakenews.com/gems/e_article000008954.cfm] The Olive Tree World Web site has articles about olives and their importance in world history, Mediterranean cooking and healthy eating. [http://www.olivetree.eat-online.net/]

Beyond familiar tastes and uses, each of the Seven Species is said to have special kabbalistic attributes. The Lubavitcher Rebbe suggests that for most of us, "life" is synonymous with "struggle... We struggle to find a partner in life, and then we struggle to preserve our marriage; we struggle to raise our children... The 'olive' in us is that part of ourselves that thrives on struggle, that revels in it, that would no more escape it than escape life itself. 'Just like an olive,' say our sages, 'which yields its oil only when pressed,' so, too, do we yield what is best in us only when pressed between the millstones of life and the counter forces of a divided self." To find out why the date embodies "perfection," and the pomegranate represents "deeds," check out Yanki Tauber's article "Seasons of the Soul: The Seven Kinds." [http://chabadonline.com/scripts/tgij/paper/Article.asp?ArticleID=2776]

Although each of the Seven Species has its own unique quality, I don't think ancient Israelites ever considered that mixing them together would deliver something pleasing to the palate. But one company has done just that with its "Bible Bar," whose packaging features the unique slogan: "Contains the Foods of Deuteronomy 8:8." The bar's creator says God became the first nutritionist when He commanded, "You shall not eat of every tree in the garden." [http://www.newhousenews.com/archive/feran042403.html] (If you know of a kosher product or recipe that incorporates all Seven Species, please pass along the information.)

Have a very happy Shavuot.

A good teacher can transform a life

By ELLIOTT MALAMET

It's the end of another school year. By June, most teachers are, beneath their goodbye smiles and words of praise for overachieving students, frazzled to the bone. So in tribute to the job done but often not fully appreciated, I offer some thoughts regarding the teaching profession.

JEWISH EDUCATION
The Next Generation

From Donald Quinn: "If a doctor, lawyer or dentist had 40 people in his office at one time, all of whom had different needs, and some of whom didn't want to be there and were causing trouble, and the doctor, lawyer or dentist, without assistance, had to treat them all with professional excellence for nine months, then he might have some conception of the classroom teacher's job." Amen.

The singular irony of the relationship between a teacher's power and their significance is acutely perceived by Tracy Kidder: "Most teachers have little or no control over school policy or curriculum or choice of texts or special placement of students, but most have a great deal of autonomy inside the classroom. To a degree shared by only a few other occupations, such as police work, public education rests precariously on the skill and virtue of the people at the bottom of the institutional pyramid."

Although Quinn and Kidder refer to public schools with massively overpopulated public school classrooms, their thoughts will still resonate for many soldiers on the Jewish educational battlefield.

What is the goal of education? Regarding the ongoing controversy over teaching information versus inspiring young minds, Robert Shaffer notes, "We must view young people not as empty bottles to be filled, but as candles to be lit." George Bernard Shaw adds, "What we want is to see the child in pursuit of knowledge, and not knowledge in pursuit of the child."

Ultimately, however, it is not the intelligence or the organizational skills or the humour or the logic or the creativity of the teacher that cuts the deepest. Teachers who reach the student's vulnerability and are able, through the magic of a warm and caring personality, to transform the student's year and sometimes their life, are the ones who are truly remembered, as Carl Jung asserts: "One looks back with appreciation to the brilliant teachers, but with gratitude to those who touched our human feelings. The curriculum is so much necessary raw material, but warmth is the vital element for the growing plant and for the soul of the child."

For the teacher of Jewish studies, special challenges abound, as the task is not just to nurture hearts but to pierce souls. This is a unique test and requires a distinctive response. Perhaps no one frames the task better than Rav Aharon Lichtenstein: "It is difficult to nurture values of faith and trust in an environment dominated by secularism. Faith and trust are not the most marketable merchandise. I am convinced that students can easily distinguish between a teacher who is truly devoted to his or her calling, whose soul is bound up with that which he or she teaches, and one who only goes through the motions and regards teaching as merely a livelihood."

As we pray each evening, the Torah is our life and the length of our days. May our students feel the same way, long after they leave us.

Next generation gives back to the community

By STACEY STEIN
Special to The CJN

For the first time, three twentysomethings are leading a fundraising committee for the Baycrest Centre Foundation's annual campaign.

David Rosmarin, Jesse Kaufman and Evan Cooperman are co-chairing the Next Generation Committee, which is made up of young volunteers whose task it is to target donors in the $1,000 and under category.

"It's very meaningful for young people to get involved," said Rosmarin, 24. "It's an amazing opportunity for young people to give back to the community."

The committee's goal is to raise $500,000. Forty volunteers between the ages of 18 and 25 staffed the group's first fundraising event, a one-day telethon this past April. The telethon raised $75,000 in six hours.

"The telethon was so successful because of the generosity of the community – that's both the people that made the phone calls and the people that made the donations," said Kaufman, 25.

Rosmarin said, "You can make a tremendous difference to the community in very few hours. People want to give."

The Next Generation Committee plans to hold at least two more telethons this year, with the next one planned for this summer.

Kaufman said the group provides young people with the opportunity to get involved in the Jewish community.

"Some young Jews are cut off from the community and it's very tough for young people to know how or where to start," he said. "This is a great institution… Everyone in the Toronto Jewish community benefits from [Baycrest] at some point."

Kaufman said after the first telethon, some of the volunteers who had initially been reluctant to make calls ended up asking how they could become more involved with the committee.

"There are a lot of young people that are looking for good things to do," he said.

This year's campaign is also significant because a group of Baycrest supporters established a matching fund. The group will donate up to $2 million for the campaign by matching every donation from a first-time contributor or any increase from a prior donation. For example, if you gave $50 last year and donate $100 this year, an additional $50 will be donated.

Frances Bigman, a development officer for the Baycrest Centre Foundation, said it is important for young people to get involved in Baycrest.

"It is wonderful to see young people paying tribute to those same seniors that built the community from which they now benefit," she said.

Here in Jerusalem I've found a community of seekers. The air is charged with our debates as we try to assimilate into our lives all that we've learned. I feel energized by the opportunity to support Israel. Marla Bennett, Masters degree student in Jewish Education. Murdered at the Frank Sinatra Student Center, July 31, 2002.

The founders of the Hebrew University of Jerusalem knew that an institution of higher education, representing the greatest values of the Jewish people, was central to the creation of a sovereign Jewish homeland.

The Israel government's need to divert funding to defense is exacting a costly toll in budget cuts to the University.

Not only must we meet increased demands with fewer resources, but there is also an urgent need to upgrade and bolster security. The only way we can maintain an environment where our students can live and study in safety is with your help.

To continue our standard of excellence and well being, we urgently need your financial support now. If you would like to help us to build a protective fence around the University, please contact me today: Joan Stevens, Director.

Concert to assist guard who tried to stop bombing

By ADAM SEGAL
Special to The CJN

When young Canadians venture to Israel, they naturally seek a dose of Canadiana and have frequently found it at Mike's Place, a popular Tel Aviv rock n' roll bar.

In late April, Mike's Place was hit by a suicide bombing that killed three people and left dozens injured. The death toll could have been much higher had security guard Avi Taviv not lunged at the bomber before he detonated himself.

Now, two Toronto men who have spent countless days revelling in the fun of Mike's Place are trying to assist with Taviv's recovery by holding a benefit concert.

"I can't imagine the thought going through [Taviv's] head... He knew this guy was the bomber and physically threw himself at him. It's just incredible," said Steven Devor, who is organizing the concert with friend Michael Dacks.

Taviv is reported to have undergone three surgeries after suffering a broken neck and various other injuries in the blast, but he is on the road to recovery.

"It's a miracle he's alive. It's a miracle he survived," said Dacks, 27, who spent two years as a paratrooper in the Israel Defence Forces and intends to return this summer to Israel to complete his law degree.

The benefit concert, which will be held June 9 at 9 p.m. at The Silver Dollar, 486 Spadina Ave., will help foot the bill for Taviv's medical expenses, and school tuition.

Proceeds will also go toward other victims of the attack.

Two local bands and other musicians will join in the jam, recreating the sounds of Neil Young, the Rolling Stones and the other rock artists whose music is played at Mike's Place.

Dacks said he chose the Silver Dollar as the venue because it has an ambience similar to Mike's Place.

"We wanted to bring the atmosphere [of Mike's Place] here," Dacks said.

Dacks and Devor, two former classmates at Leo Baeck Day School who re-established their childhood friendship in Israel in the late 1990s, often spent time at the original Mike's Place in Jerusalem.

"The beers were waiting for me when I walked in the door," Dacks recalled.

"Everyone has the exact same story."

The popularity of the Jerusalem location prompted the opening of a second Mike's Place in Tel Aviv a few years ago, despite the spate of bombings in the coastal city.

A week after the suicide bombing, the bar was up and running again.

"If they can put their lives back together in a week, we can surely organize a benefit concert," Dacks said.

"Jews in Toronto feel very strongly about Israel... and we want to do something concrete [for Israel]. This is a nice, small way to begin doing that," added Devor, 27, a York University student.

Group for South African Jews to be launched

By JENNIFER M. PAQUETTE
Special to The CJN

While Canada's South African Jewish population grows steadily, fewer and fewer relatives and friends are left behind to care for those who can't leave – the elderly, people living in poverty, orphaned children.

Now, Canadians have a way to help, through a new organization called Canadian Friends of the South African Chevrah Kadisha (CAFSACK).

Concert set for July 2

CAFSACK will formally celebrate its launch with a concert on Wednesday, July 2, 8 p.m., at the Toronto Centre for the Arts. The event will feature Oshy Tugendhaft and the Sydenham Choir, names CAFSACK executive member Mel Rom says will resonate with any Jew from South Africa.

The event is "a great opportunity to experience first hand how South Africans feel about their country and… do something to alleviate a great financial burden," Rom says.

Although most Jews associate the term chevrah kadishah (literally, "sacred society") with death and burial, Rom says, particularly in Johannesburg, its mandate is far wider.

"The Johannesburg chevrah kadishah is by far the largest," says Rom, who volunteered with the organization when he lived there. "It used to be just a burial society, but over a 10- to 12-year period, its annual budget has increased to 75 million Rand ($12-13 million Cdn)."

"To put this into perspective," Rom adds, "United Way's budget is $70 million for all Canadians, which is equivalent to $30-$40 million there… Given that the Rand to Canadian dollar is five to one, our dollar can actually go a long way over there; $100 gets you R550.

"And it's an unbelievable cause," he adds, noting that the Johannesburg organization alone supports more than 2,000 people in nursing homes each month for food, housing and medical care.

"They rely and depend on the chevrah kadishah income," says Rom. Previously, they were living in "run down, crime-ridden, unsafe places."

In addition to caring for an aging population, the chevrah kadishah is responsible for Johannesburg's Jewish orphanage, providing all the children's physical and medical needs. It also offers scholarships and other educational opportunities for young adults, and helps them meet other young Jews.

Rom says CAFSACK supports burial societies throughout South Africa. "A lot of Jews have left smaller towns and congregated in larger cities, and each small town had its Jewish cemetery… [If] the synagogue is closed down, that cemetery needs to be maintained."

Canadians wishing to show support through CAFSACK can either make a general donation or direct funds to specific cemeteries or communities.

"People here had parents, grandparents, scattered across the country," Rom says. "Donations can be made to CAFSACK to maintain a specific gravesite or to honour a specific individual. We also accept donations in honour of an event [or] dedicate them to a specific need."

The large chevrah kadishah organizations with which CAFSACK is affiliated remit funds in turn to smaller organizations, so donations will trickle down to where they're needed most, he says.

CAFSACK is also inspiring Jews from other communities. People tell Rom it is amazing that they haven't forgotten about the cemeteries and the gravesites in South Africa.

"Everybody living here… has that responsibility [to see] that gravesites are maintained, that elderly people are cared for," one person told him.

In the 1970s South Africa's Jewish population peaked at around 120,000. Today, Rom says, "you've probably got a population of about… 80,000. Every year we're seeing just a huge immigration. If you think about the population that left, those are the ones who have the means to go somewhere else."

When they leave, they take with them "not only what they've accumulated but what they would have earned in the future," leaving behind "a population who's a lot older, with greater needs for welfare… The burdens become enormous; year after year, these institutions have to go out and raise funds from fewer and fewer people living in the country."

Rom, who's been in Canada about two years, says he is thrilled at this chance to make a difference with CAFSACK, an organization he founded with six or seven other expatriates.

He's excited about CAFSACK's launch, not just as a fundraiser, but as a unifying community event. Tugendhaft, he says, is a chazzan at one of South Africa's largest congregations, and along with the Sydenham choir, recently filled London's Royal Albert Hall with a crowd of 2,500. Here, CAFSACK is hoping for a sellout crowd of 1,800 on July 2. "They'll feel an incredible amount of nostalgia."

Rom estimates that there are about 20,000 South African Jews in the GTA alone, with many more spread out across Canada. "This organization isn't just set up for Toronto; we want people from all areas across the country involved in helping to market and spread the word about CAFSACK… it has to extend to Vancouver, Hamilton, Edmonton… everywhere South African Jews are living."

Palestinians want Israel dead: Prager

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Peace has eluded Israel and the Palestinians for one good reason, says American radio talk show host and author Dennis Prager.

"The Palestinians want Israel destroyed," he said at the Lawrence and Frances Bloomberg lecture at Holy Blossom Temple last week. "That's the only obstacle to peace."

And the world does not want to recognize this, said Prager, who is based in Los Angeles. But if the Palestinians came to terms with Israel's existence, they could attain statehood within a week, he said.

The Palestinian leadership, however, denies Israel's legitimacy, and covets Haifa, Tel Aviv and Eilat, in addition to the West Bank and the Gaza Strip.

Prager suggested that Jews are wasting their time endlessly debating the rights and wrongs of Israel's communities in the West Bank and Gaza because the Palestinians "want Israel dead."

He expressed concern that U.S. President George W. Bush, whom he said he trusts, seems unaware of the Palestinians' real goal.

That is why, Prager said, he is worried about the "road map," the internationally-sanctioned and U.S.-supported peace plan to resolve the Arab-Israeli conflict.

Prager accused Arab states of using the Palestinians as a "battering ram" against Israel.

He also denounced Palestinian suicide bombers, whose prime objective, he said, is to enjoy the promise of virgins in heaven.

Or, as he put it, "Blow up a Jew and get laid."

In a swipe at press coverage of the Arab-Israeli conflict, Prager condemned newspapers for labelling "terrorists" "militants" and using morally neutral headlines to describe terrorist incidents.

By engaging in these practices, he charged, the media obscures the moral clarity of Israel's cause.

In a biting reference to Jews who mercilessly criticize Israel, Prager said, "We produce a lot of sick people."

Citing two examples, he mentioned U.S. scholar and critic Noam Chomsky and Canadian columnist Rick Salutin.

He said their judgments are clouded by "moral confusion."

Prager counted Christian fundamentalists in the United States as Israel's only "true friends," and said that if Jews believed in the Torah as much as some Christians, the Messiah would appear.

PEACEMAKER'S CARNIVAL: USDS Bathurst campus students recently held a Peacemaker's Carnival to demonstrate their commitment to peaceful problem solving and Derekh Eretz. Peacemakers are students, identified by bright orange vests, who undergo special training to find positive ways to solve disagreements. At the carnival, students participated in activities which involved problem solving or conflict resolution. OUR FOUNDATION FOR THE FUTURE

Agudas Hamishpocha Philanthropic Fund

How a caring family planned for the community's future

What started out as an informal social club for a close-knit family has grown into a full-fledged breakfast club that has donated tens of thousands of dollars to Jewish charities.

This year, members of Toronto's Rubinoff, Naftolin and Arnoff families will celebrate the 75th anniversary of that day in 1928 when a group of Russian immigrants new to Toronto decided to form an official family club.

"Our parents were extremely poor and nobody could afford entertainment," recalls Norman Rubinoff, president of Agudas Hamishpocha (which means united families) and son of one of the founders. "So instead they decided to meet in different people's houses once a month and have a party."

But fun wasn't the only item on the agenda. They enjoyed their gatherings immensely, particularly the summertime picnics in High Park and the many events held in their building in the heart of Toronto's downtown Jewish neighbourhood, yet were committed to the Jewish community and always looked for ways to give of themselves.
In its early years, says Mr. Rubinoff, the family formed the Agudas Hamishpocha Loan Syndicate to provide its members with interest-free loans, and by the 1940s the family's Ladies Auxiliary began holding teas and rummage sales to raise money for charity.

As the community moved north, the family sold its original downtown headquarters and purchased a place near the corner of Wilson Avenue and Bathurst Street. They sold it in 1988 and set up the Agudas Hamishpocha Philanthropic Fund with most of the proceeds. A small amount was set aside to fund the clan's breakfast meetings, now held seven times a year at the Borochov Centre.

"It didn't feel right to just divvy up the money amongst ourselves," says Mr. Rubinoff, whose 80 members pay $25 in annual dues. "Rather, we felt better about putting the money towards some worthy causes."

"Way back when Agudas Hamishpocha was founded, its members were very poor, yet they always managed to give back to the community because they saw the need," says Mr. Rubinoff.

Mishpocha Executive from the 1930's

The $100,000 endowment fund, administered by the Jewish Foundation of Greater Toronto, supports numerous charities including UJA Federation's annual campaign, the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre's Hebrew Club for the Blind and day camp scholarships, Baycrest Centre, Israel's Weizmann Institute of Science, Israel Cancer Research Fund, Jewish Camp Council, and Reena Foundation, among others.

"Over the years our family has stuck together, and despite tough economic times we've continued to devote our time and money to charity. We learned this important mitzvah from our parents, and through the fund we're teaching our next generation to do the same."

THINKING AHEAD

We talk a lot about continuity—about the importance of creating a sustainable, vibrant Jewish community for the generations to come. For years, your annual gift to the UJA Federation Annual Campaign has helped to fill so many vital Jewish needs. You can help to ensure our Jewish future by establishing a Perpetual Annual Campaign Endowment (PACE).

Once you create a PACE, it makes an gift to the annual campaign in your name forever. It can be funded in a number of ways, all of which offer financial and tax advantages. When considering your estate plan, please consider adding a PACE or LOJE (Lion of Judah Endowment).

For more information about planned giving opportunities, please contact Carol Kassel, Director of the Jewish Foundation of Greater Toronto, 416-631-5674 or ckassel@ujafed.org.

ask PAC...

This is a new feature from the Jewish Foundation of Greater Toronto's Professional Advisory Committee (PAC) to help you with financial and estate planning issues. We welcome your questions.

Q My spouse died some time ago, and I have remained alone in our home. Our children are well provided for and I am thinking of gifting our home to charity. A friend has suggested that I can do so and remain in my home for the balance of my life. Is she correct, and how does this work?

Robert Cohen, Q.C.
Blaney McMurtry LLP

A Yes - she is correct - and there are a number of ways that this can be done:

- You can choose to donate your home to a charity now while you are alive.
- You can choose to donate your home to a charity by way of a bequest in your will to take effect upon your death..
- You can make the donation now and defer the granting of possession until your death.
- You can make the donation in your will and defer the granting of possession until a subsequent event. This often happens when both spouses are alive and the owner chooses to donate the home by way of will bequest, but defer possession until the death of the surviving spouse.

The last two examples are described as gifts of "residual interest". The only difference in each of the above situations is the calculation of the tax receipt that you or your estate will receive from the CCRA. In all cases, the property vests in the designated charity at the time of the transfer, and the transfer is irrevocable, or permanent.

If you are donating your principal residence, there is no issue of a capital gains liability. If the gift is an outright gift, either during your lifetime or by will, it will be deemed to be disposed of at fair market value. However, if the gift is a gift of a residual interest, a calculation must be made beginning with fair market value, and then discounting the value based upon an actuarial calculation of the life expectancy of the person gifting the residual interest.

In summary, there are different ways to make a gift of your home to charity that can be advantageous to you, and meaningful for the charity.

UJA Federation readies for major mission to Israel

UJA Federation is currently planning its largest Israel solidarity mission since September 2000.

Dubbed B'Yachad (Together), the mission - which is expected to send 300 people to Israel from November 11 to 19 - has already attracted dozens of participants.

Chaired by Michael Buckstein, Stephen Goldhar and Barry Zagdanski, B'Yachad will offer mission participants the opportunity to meet Prime Minister Ariel Sharon.

"Prime Minister Sharon and the people of Israel are looking forward to this upcoming mission," says UJA Federation's Emissary from the State of Israel, Yossi Tanuri. "When they heard that we are expecting to send 300 members of Toronto's Jewish community to Israel, you could feel their excitement and sense of anticipation. Israelis know how Toronto has always supported them in the past, and this mission is being looked at by Israel as an extremely important show of solidarity."

Barry Zagdanski, dubbed "Mr. Mission" chats with former Israeli PM Benjamin Netanyahu on a past UJA Federation Israel Solidarity Mission.

After their arrival in Israel, the Toronto contingent will be joined by many more Canadians from coast-to-coast, already in Israel at that time. They will come together for a unique event called Canada Salutes Israel, at the Palmachim Air Force Base near Tel Aviv.

During the Canada Salutes Israel festivities, the Canadians will be joined by two thousand pilots and soldiers from the Israel Defence Forces, as well as Prime Minister Sharon.

"It's going to be the most incredible mission, in terms of the numbers of people going, and the show of solidarity Canadians will make," says Buckstein. "It's important people realize that although there will be hundreds going, we're not sacrificing the individuality and intimacy people need."

"This is the mission that proud, Jewish Torontonians simply cannot afford to miss," says Goldhar. "Participants will make a direct impact on the lives of Israelis, not simply by being there, but by volunteering at various social service agencies. What a wonderful opportunity."

Dubbed "Mr. Mission" for his relentless recruitment of mission participants, Barry Zagdanski knows that B'Yachad is not a typical Israel mission.

"Absolutely not," he insists. "This mission is a classic case of strength in numbers. The itinerary is completely different than the norm. For one thing, we will be spending more time with Israelis, living like Israelis, doing what Israelis do day to day. People should take advantage of this mission. They may not have a better chance to express their love and support for Israel."

legacy of life

Barbara Frum 1937 - 1992

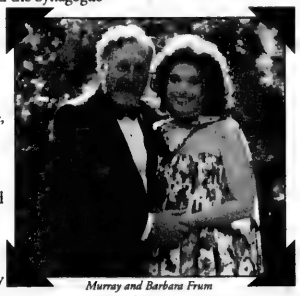
Barbara Frum may have been one of Canada's most well-known and respected personalities, yet fame didn't faze her. To those who knew her best, Barbara was a giving and gracious woman who cared deeply about others and never missed an opportunity to show it.

How many of her TV viewers knew that the famous CBC news anchor never charged a speaker's fee for her lectures or appearances, choosing instead to donate the money to charity? Or that she and her husband Murray were so devastated by the plight of Soviet Jews in the 1970s that they encouraged community leaders to make hundreds of dollars worth of overseas telephone calls from their own home so they could arrange swift travel to Israel? Or that for many years Barbara was the largest female donor to UJA Federation's annual campaign and was a role model for women in the community.

"My mother's big mantra was, 'I want to be a good person,'" says daughter Linda Frum. "And she devoted herself to that cause by giving of herself, caring about the world, being informed about the world, and simply being a very loving person."

These are qualities Barbara came by naturally. She was raised in Niagara Falls, Ontario, the eldest of Harold and Florence Rosberg's three children. The family, which owned the area's popular Rosberg's department store for more than 50 years, was steeped in Jewish communal life. Their home was always open, with Jewish community leaders stopping in when they needed a place to stay, and they regularly donated clothing and other items from their store to those less fortunate. Barbara's grandfather Jacob was one of the original members of Niagara Falls' Beth Jacob Synagogue and Harold and his brother Joe were instrumental in creating a Jewish area in the city-run cemetery to ensure proper Jewish burial. Florence was president of Niagara Falls' Hadassah-WIZO chapter.

For her part, young Barbara attended a Jewish overnight camp and the Synagogue youth group, and at the age of 18 she enrolled at the University of Toronto's largely Jewish University College. During her first year there, she met Murray Frum, a man she was instantly attracted to for his intelligence, confidence, wit and energy, and they married soon after. Barbara was passionate about art and together with Murray they supported Toronto's arts community, including the Art Gallery of Ontario and the Stratford Festival. And says Linda, Barbara's sense of tzedakah (charity) and chesed (acts of kindness) was an integral part of her life.



Murray and Barbara Frum

"My mother had this fearless questioning of things," says Linda. "She had curiosity, a love of learning, a profound respect for the written word, and a deep sense of justice. These were critical parts of her character, and I believe she would say they were informed by her Jewish education."

Barbara cared deeply about Israel and showed it at every turn. It was she who maintained the connection with Murray's cousins in Israel so that Linda and her brothers David and Matthew would know their extended family. And even when she became Canada's most recognized journalist, she never missed a chance to stand up for Israel on air.

"As host of CBC's The Journal during the Lebanon War, my mother fought very hard to ensure balanced coverage of Israel," says Linda. "That sense of fairness at the CBC is one of the many things that has suffered since her death."

But although she was good to life, life had a funny way of showing its appreciation. Barbara was struck with leukemia when she was just 36 and spent the rest of her life battling back. She lived each day with a tremendous sense of precariousness and passion, says Linda, and always surrounded herself by what she loved - her poodle Diva who had the run of her CBC office, her remarkable home garden that was both a physical and spiritual retreat, her intoxicating work, and the deep personal relationships she developed along the way.

Journalist Robert Fulford, a longtime friend, says Barbara reflected Jewish tradition most directly through her studious attitude to everything she cared about. Hers was a serious life lived with vivacity and dedication, he says, and it's an example to those she left behind when she died of cancer in the spring of 1992.

"What we all learned from Barbara - or tried to - was attentiveness to life," he says. "She was the most caring of friends and the most thoughtful of conversationalists. She remained a hard-working student all her life: of history, of art, of politics, of journalism, of architecture and gardening. Nothing was lost on her. Barbara grew as a professional and as a private individual because she thought that the life around her, and the history that had created this life, was worth her most careful attention."

Legacy of Life is a presentation of the Jewish Foundation of Greater Toronto to honour the memory of those who have made an exceptional contribution to our community.

Toronto Jewry flourishes: generation to generation

New census data confirms Jewish growth

By DANIEL HOROWITZ

In just one generation, Toronto's Jewish community has almost doubled in size from 97,000 in 1971 to nearly 180,000 today. Those encouraging numbers come from a new Jewish demographic study based on 2001 census data.

"Toronto continues to grow as the leading centre of Jewish life in Canada, and one of the world's leading Jewish cities," says Dr. Stuart Schoenfeld, Chair, Department of Sociology, Glendon College, York University. "In fact, in terms of Jewish population, Toronto has moved up the list of leading cities in the Diaspora. Toronto's Jewish populace is now number 10 or 11 in the Diaspora, and it is regarded as one of the world's most important Jewish communities."

Cities with the Largest Jewish Population in the Diaspora

New York, N.Y.	1,750,000
Miami, FLA.	535,000
Los Angeles, CA.	490,000
Paris, France	350,000
Philadelphia, PA.	254,000
Chicago, ILL.	248,000
San Francisco, CA.	210,000
London, Eng.	200,000

Washington, D.C.	165,000

According to results from the 2001 Canadian census, Toronto's Jewish population stood at 179,100, surpassing the anticipated total of 175,000. The original census data separated its findings by recording those who identified themselves as Jewish by religion and those who consider themselves Jewish by ethnicity. The most recent demographic study directed by Shahar combines ethnicity and religion.

"I believe that it is important for people to know that while the religion-only numbers supplied by the census gives us a base to work with, you then have to add thousands more people who identified themselves as Jews by ethnic origin," says Schoenfeld.

Charles Shahar, Chief Researcher, National Demographic Study for UIA Federations Canada (UIAFC), agrees.

"Absolutely," he says. "Taking only the ethnic numbers, or the religion numbers on their own, does not give a complete picture of the Jewish community. It must be a combination of ethnicity and religion numbers, not one or the other."

In 1991, Jewish Toronto consisted of 162,495 people. Ten years later, Toronto has gained more than 16,000 community members, an increase of over ten percent.

"In absolute terms, Toronto gained more Jewish citizens in those 10 years than any other Jewish community in Canada," says Shahar. "In fact, Toronto gained five times more Jews than the next highest city, Vancouver, over that decade."

Particularly impressive about Toronto's burgeoning Jewish population is growth among the 15-24 year-olds, an increase of 20 percent over 1991. "These numbers bode well for the future of Jewish Toronto," says Shahar.

"There's no doubt," says Schoenfeld, "the growth in Toronto's population has been quite impressive, which is not that surprising since Toronto is the leading economic centre of Canada. It is even more impressive that the members of Toronto's Jewish community are aware of the significance and importance of Toronto as a Jewish city in the world and they act accordingly."

Overwhelmed by Jewish Toronto

"We're so happy to be here"

Hearing stories about Toronto's "amazing" Jewish community over and over again from her brother and sister, former Montrealer Marion Miller decided to make that drive down the 401 west.

Since Marion, 37, her husband Eric, 42, and their two children, David,12, and Janna 8, made the move to Toronto four years ago, they haven't looked back.

"I suppose the main reason we left Montreal for Toronto – other than the respective economies – was to be part of Toronto's unbelievable Jewish community," says Marion.

"We had always heard that it was a great place to raise Jewish kids. While I still have some family in Montreal and I miss them, it was the right move coming here."

"I couldn't believe it," she says, "everywhere I looked there were signs telling us to join one Jewish activity or another. For every holiday there's a dozen signs. Toronto's community is so huge, they advertise and celebrate their Judaism. Being kosher here is incredibly easy too, I fell in love with Sobeys the moment I arrived."

Marion's husband Eric echoes his wife's sentiments.

"It's not that I disliked Montreal, it's just that I was so overwhelmed by the strength, passion, vibrancy and size of Toronto's Jewish community," says Eric. "No matter where you go in Toronto, Jews are proud to be Jews. The people are warm and welcoming and it's just such a pleasure to be part of such a wonderful Jewish community. We're so happy to be here, I'd say we definitely picked the right place to raise our family."

Legion's General Wingate branch marks 70th year

By ADAM SEGAL
Special to The CJN

Major General Orde Charles Wingate was a staunch Zionist in the 1930s when the British army he fought for was preventing Jews from entering Palestine, sometimes by force.

As a tribute, Canadian Jewish war veterans named their branch of the Royal Canadian Legion the General Wingate Branch 256. Last week, the branch celebrated its 70th anniversary in a ceremony attended by 125 people at Beth Radom synagogue.

Murray Jacobs, the 82-year-old chair of the anniversary celebration, was a sergeant who served overseas in the Canadian Armed Forces from 1942 to 1946. He had no qualms about volunteering for service.

"If this country is good enough to live in, we should defend it," Jacobs said.

Many of the attendees served during World War II, as well as in Israel's War of Independence in 1948.

Sam Gotlieb was in the Royal Canadian Air Force from 1943 to 1946, serving in England, Holland, Belgium and Germany.

Looking around at his colleagues, Gotlieb said, "It's so nice that so many [veterans] are still around."

Irving Kaplansky served in Israel's War of Independence. He said as a young Jewish man, there was an implicit call to duty.

"I volunteered because there was an urgency for people to go into the army," he said.

Ontario MPP David Young lauded the veterans and their fallen comrades for risking their lives in the fight for freedom.

"I'm here to tell you that we do remember your great sacrifice," said Young.

"You gave up your youth and your health... because of the fact you were patriots."

Young said the veterans' war efforts have ensured the continuation of Canada's democratic values and institutions.

Wingate was born into a religious Christian family and believed deeply in the Bible's prophecy of Jewish redemption in the Holy Land.

He served as an intelligence officer in Mandatory Palestine from 1936 to 1939, training Haganah fighters in special night operations to fend off Arab attackers.

But as the British adopted a stricter policy towards Jewish immigration, Wingate met with resistance from his superiors. He was transferred out of Mandatory Palestine in 1939 and his passport was stamped with a restriction that he not be permitted to return.

The former Jewish Brigade named itself after Wingate in the mid-1940s in his honour.

Today, the branch supports Sunnybrook Hospital and in 1995, several branch members visited Amsterdam to commemorate their role in liberating the Dutch during World War II.

"For all those who enlisted during World War II, the hope was for freedom and peace in Canada and throughout the world," said branch president Sam Romberg.

"At this time, we need to continue our efforts toward the struggle for peace and liberty for all humankind."

SARS forces postponement of wedding

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

Michelle Markowitz was really looking forward to her day as a blushing bride. Instead, she's "just really, really sad."

Markowitz, a 26-year-old occupational therapist at St. John's Rehabilitation Hospital in North York, spent the day of her own wedding wearing a mask while in quarantine against SARS.

She's fine – no fever, no symptoms at all – but was ordered into isolation after hospital officials noticed unusual pneumonia-like symptoms among patients.

Markowitz learned of the order on the 11 o'clock news May 23, just two days before she was to walk down the aisle at Beth Sholom Synagogue to wed fiancé Brad Goldsmith.

"My first thought was, 'I won't be at my own wedding!'" Markowitz chuckled good-naturedly in a phone interview. "Then I realized there wouldn't be any wedding."

Markowitz was scheduled to be in isolation until June 1. "The days are going by," she sighed.

Family out of pocket an estimated $15,000

Meantime, Markowitz and her family are out of pocket an estimated $15,000 that had been spent on the caterer, flowers, hand-made invitations, kippot and a personalized ketubah. The couple-to-be also lost the deposit on a restaurant they had booked for an out-of-towners dinner.

She said her parents are looking into whether there's any insurance coverage for the loss.

They had invited about 220 people, who had to be told to stay home. Guests had already flown in from California and Florida, only to be told the nuptials were on hold.

Ironically, roughly 40 members of Goldsmith's family from the United States had already cancelled due to the SARS scare. Goldsmith, an accountant, hails from Michigan.

"It was an American long weekend too," Markowitz says, referring to Memorial Day. "It was going to be perfect."

The couple has re-scheduled the wedding for Nov. 8.

"I hope we'll have better luck," Markowitz said.

Lake scientist Norman Yan wins research awards

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Norman David Yan is in a better position to clean up Ontario's lakes now that he has won two prestigious academic prizes worth more than half a million dollars.

Yan, a York University and Ontario Ministry of the Environment lake scientist (limnologist), was recently notified he had won $650,000 to further his research on "multiple ecological stressors."

A $500,000 grant from the Canada Foundation for Innovation will enable him to build a state-of-the-art field laboratory in Dorset, Ontario.

A $150,000 Premier Research Excellence Award will permit him to launch four graduate student projects.

Yan's research is on a very practical plane.

"I work on the effects of multiple ecological stressors on Canada's inland lakes," said Yan, who is also a biologist, botanist and zoologist. "I also work on factors that regulate the recovery of lakes from past damage."

The stressors he explores range from acid rain, metals and excess nutrients to UV radiation, exotic species and plankton (floating organisms).

"Essentially, this lab will allow my students and me to culture plant and animal plankton and expose them to various light, temperature, chemical and ecological gradients to help both identify the causes of current problems facing Ontario's inland lakes and predict future changes," he said.

The lab, which is expected to be up and running within a year, will be housed on the property of the Dorset Environmental Science Centre and the Ministry of the Environment.

Two of the graduate students will study the impact of a pesky invading species, the spiny water flea, on Ontario's lakes.

A third student will try to ascertain whether long-term changes in animal plankton communities stem from changes in the biochemistry of the food base.

The fourth student will write a preliminary report on the consequences of falling calcium concentrations in softwater lakes.

Yan, a graduate of the University of Guelph and the University of Toronto, said that multiple ecological stressors probably have a great impact on lakes.

"No one knows the economic effects, but they must be enormous. We are just beginning to study the ecological effects. We're in the realm of a very new science here."

According to Yan, lakes all over eastern North America are under stress.

"But the stressors of concern vary from place to place. Climate change is more important in northwestern Ontario, but in southeastern Ontario, acid rain, invasive species and excess nutrients are the problems."

He is optimistic the problems can be resolved.

"We've solved huge problems in the past, and we can learn from these lessons. The keys are adequate knowledge to allow us to identify threats at an early stage, research to identify the cause of the threat, and information transfer to management agencies and the public about the threats, their causes and their resolution."

The most serious threats come from non-indigenous species, pollution and climate change, he said.

Yan, the son of a wood chemist and a store manager, was born in Sault Ste. Marie in 1948.

He was initiated into biology by the "two Maxes." Max, Yan's father, was an outdoorsman who introduced him to "the amazing 'invisible' world in a drop of pond water." A family friend, Max Illand, took Yan on his first overnight canoeing trip.

"Since those early days, I always sought to spend as much time out of doors as possible. I looked for graduate student projects that would allow me to understand the life of Ontario's lakes," said Yan.

Yan joined the Ontario Water Resources Commission in 1970 as a mobile laboratory operator, and the Ministry of the Environment in 1976 as a scientist.

Three years ago, he joined York University's department of biology.

"While I'm a full-time professor, I currently work under a partnership agreement with the Ministry of the Environment. I really value the opportunity to bring students into a functioning government lab. The ivory tower has no place in my life, and students seem to value this."

"Real Jews: Secular Versus Ultra-Orthodox and The Struggle for Jewish Identity in Israel"

Monday, June 16, 2003
8:00 P.M.

Shaarei Tefillah Congregation
3600 Bathurst Street

No Admission Cover & Refreshments Will Be Served

In REAL JEWS, Noah Efron has drawn close parallels between the rhetoric and propagandistic advertising denouncing the ultra-Orthodox and traditional anti-Semitic attacks that have historically raged throughout Europe. There are chilling similarities between statements by prominent Nazis and Israeli politicians journalists and academics. Much of this is almost unfathomable, exposing a restrained war between secular and Orthodox Jews that is tearing Israel apart. Prof. Noah Efron brings into focus a country at war with itself, obsessed with and conflicted about that it means to be a Jew.

McMaster president 2003 Hamilton Negev honoree

By PHYLLIS SHRAGGE
Hamilton Correspondent

HAMILTON — Peter George, president and vice-chancellor of McMaster University, has been chosen Hamilton's 2003 JNF Negev Dinner honoree in recognition of excellence in communal leadership and support of the Jewish community.

The June 15 dinner, sponsored by the Jewish National Fund of Hamilton in conjunction with State of Israel Bonds, will include an address by former Ontario premier Bob Rae and a memorial tribute to Ilan Ramon and the other astronauts who died in the Columbia space shuttle disaster. Former astronaut and McMaster University graduate Roberta Bondar will chair the memorial tribute.

Peter George

Funds raised from the dinner will go toward the reforestation of Mount Scopus in Jerusalem. Dinner proceeds exceeding the amount targeted for the project will go to student exchange programs between McMaster and Hebrew University of Jerusalem.

In an interview, George said he was thrilled to be selected as the Negev Dinner honoree and was especially pleased that proceeds will go toward greening Mount Scopus.

"The project resonates with me particularly well, because McMaster is such a green campus, with a lot of green space and mature trees. I've been to Hebrew University and I know how important it will be to the community at that university to have a greener environment and to see the rest of Mount Scopus treed. It will be a huge lift to the spirits and it will build a sense of linkage between McMaster and Hebrew University, which I'd like to see extended into greater academic linkages as well."

George, who has been McMaster president since 1995, implemented and led a strategic planning initiative called Directions, which guides the university's development of teaching and research programs.

He also led the recent Changing Tomorrow Today fundraising campaign that raised more than $128 million from the private sector.

A member of the Order of Canada, George has received a number of awards for educational and community activities. The author of many publications, his recent research interests include the impacts of resource-based development on native people, community development, and the environment in Northern Ontario.

Under George's leadership, McMaster is constructing an innovative $71 million building called Centre for Learning and that is scheduled to open in September 2004. It will house such facilities as the Institute for Molecular Medicine and the Centre for Gene Therapeutics, as well as a "research incubator" supporting researchers and research projects.

The incubator will initially focus on biotechnology, but the spin-off will be intellectual property that will benefit business locally and beyond, George said.

McMaster now has research and educational partnerships with local businesses, he said, adding that additional research projects in health sciences, engineering and science will lead to more new business opportunities.

"I encourage researchers to get involved with partnerships in business. The university is not an island onto itself. It's part of this community and it can be a major contributor to the prosperous future of this community."

Regarding the role the university plays in the debate of controversial political issues, George said universities should provide a forum for discussion without fear of intimidation or violence.

"I believe the university is a place where we respect freedom of opinion and freedom of speech, including the right to express dissenting opinions… It's a place where people feel safe and secure in expressing their views. As president, it is my job to make sure that kind of place, a secure environment, is available within the university for all members of our community.

"However, I don't think it's the president's job to say who can, and who cannot, speak on campus. That kind of censorship is arbitrary and is not part of the essence of the university and our values and principles."

George credited student groups such as the Jewish Students Association for working to maintain respect of other cultural groups.

"It's important for student leadership to respect the notion of a tolerant environment in which there may be an exchange of opinions on campus."

The formation this year of the President's Advisory Committee on Building an Inclusive Community was an important step in providing a safe environment for the university's diverse multicultural community, he said.

Membership in the committee includes faculty, staff and student associations, senate and McMaster Students Union committees on human rights, and the Sexual Harassment and Anti-Discrimination Office.

"The examples of violence at Concordia [University in Montreal] and elsewhere remind us of how fine the line is between discussion and dissent and between confrontation and conflict," George said, referring to ongoing friction between student groups over the Israeli-Palestinian conflict.

"It only takes one or two hot-headed individuals who step beyond the boundaries and you can have significant problems… That's where I think peer leadership is so important. Students are the best ones to cool out the hot-heads among their members."

George said at the beginning of the school year, he signals to the leadership of student groups that the university has expectations about behaviour.

"Proactive action is better than reactive action," he said.

"I say [to student leaders], 'Let's remember the values and principles of this place and [plan] how you can pursue your interests and activities without stepping over the boundaries.'

"In the end, we're all responsible to adhere to a certain set of norms of behaviour in the university around tolerance and respect for diversity, and respect for dissenting opinion. We're our own monitors for appropriate behaviour."

A family home in a good neighbourhood.
